Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, and yet, in view of the fact that there is no public building provided for at Schenectady, I venture the prophecy that the next bill will be for a large appropriation for a public building in which the court may be held.

Mr. CALDER. There is a post-office building in that city which is sufficiently commodious to accommodate the court. The bill simply permits the holding of one term of court at Schenectady, at the option of the judge, during each year.

Mr. KING. There will be an appropriation asked for in a few years for a public building.

Mr. CALDER. I shall not ask for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its session on this calendar day it shall take a recess until Monday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I desire that the Senate may recess over until next Monday. Then I shall take up the matter and ascertain if we can not have a day next week for the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. POMERENE. That is just what I was going to refer to. I did not intend to raise any objection at all to the request of the Senator from North Dakota, because I recognize the fact that the majority are responsible for the legislative program, but I really believe that we should save time and that there would be less of extraneous discussion if we could have a morning hour once or twice each week instead of recessing from day to day. There are matters of serious importance continually coming up.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will discuss that matter with the Senator at a little later date.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KENDRICK. I present an amendment to the pending tariff bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to modify the amendment, on page 48, lines 13 and 14, by striking out the words "including scrap tin plate, $1.25," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "valued at not more than 7 cents per pound," so as to read:

Wrought and cast scrap iron, and scrap steel, valued at not more than 7 cents per pound, $1 per ton.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Tariff Commission state that the provision covering scrap steel might be construed to include alloys of steel, and especially tungsten steel, which is exceedingly valuable. The ordinary scrap steel sells for less than 1 cent a pound, and if the provision were allowed to remain as it now stands it would be possible to bring in tungsten steel valued at very much more than that at the rate provided. It was thought best, therefore, in order to insure that only the cheaper steels and not the higher grades of alloys were covered, that the amendment should be so modified.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, this is in the nature of a compensation; that is to say, the Senate, in its wisdom, has concluded to impose a tariff upon certain grades or standards of steel and alloys——

Mr. McCUMBER. Upon certain alloys, I think, would more accurately express it.

Mr. KING. Which, of course, I think ought to come in free. It is now proposed to care for some other alloy which may come in.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the modification is designed to prevent alloys which might be in the steel and which subsequently might be separated from coming in as scrap steel instead of alloys of steel in their original form.

Mr. KING. What provision does the bill make in the event that the product is worth more than 7 cents a pound?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the value reaches as high as 7 cents a pound or anywhere near that, it will not be the ordinary scrap steel for which there is provided a duty of $1 a ton. As a rule, scrap steel is sold for less than 1 cent a pound, and the amendment is simply for the purpose of keeping high-priced alloys and high-priced steels from coming in as scrap.

Mr. KING. Of course the amendment is designed to protect those who manufacture alloys in the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; if there were no duty on alloys it would make no difference.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, I will say to my colleague they will fall then in paragraphs 304 and 305.

Mr. McCUMBER. They come in under another paragraph, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. If this amendment should not be adopted then steel or tungsten alloys would be brought in as scrap steel and avoid the payment of the 72 cents on the tungsten content.

Mr. KING. The amendment is in the interest of those domestic producers of alloys.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is in the interest of our Treasury, I will say to the Senator, because, if the amendment is agreed to, the character of steel referred to when imported will have to pay the regular rate provided.

Mr. KING. Of course I was assuming in the statement which I just made that there was no tariff upon the alloys, but, in view of the fact that in some other paragraph provision has been made for a tariff upon alloys, this amendment is for the purpose of making it impossible for alloys to come in in some other form and escape the imposition of a duty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; the Senator is right.

Mr. KING. And therefore it is in the interest of the domestic producer of these alloys.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in the interest of collecting the duties upon the alloys that are brought in, instead of allowing them to come in free as scrap.

Mr. KING. It is a tax upon alloys, which is carried on to steel, and carried on from the steel products to the finished products which are consumed by the people; so ultimately it rests upon the people, and this is a tax increasing the burdens upon the ultimate consumer.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is a tariff upon the tungsten that is in the steel. I shall not admit that it is a tax. I will agree with the Senator that it is a protective tariff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which an amendment was adopted, commencing after the words "ad valorem," on line 3, page 84, going down to and including the words "ad valorem," on line 5, page 84; and I move to insert as a substitute the matter which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. On page 84, it is proposed to strike out all of the matter beginning with the word "knitting," in line 3, down to and including the words "ad valorem," in line 5, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Knitting, braiding, lace braiding, and insulating machines, and all other similar textile machinery or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for, 50 per cent ad valorem; all other textile machinery or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is entirely a new proposition, or, at least, it embraces much more than the amendment heretofore agreed to; and I shall be very glad to have the Senator from North Dakota give the Senate some reasons why he proposes so radically to change this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a reduction.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is a reduction, I shall be glad to have the Senator explain to what extent it is a reduction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senate already has approved the rate proposed upon textile machinery. The Tariff Commission suggests that the phraseology relating to textile machinery should be clarified by limiting the 50 per cent rate classification to knitting, braiding, and insulating machines, and similar textile machines. The amendment now proposed will so limit the 50 per cent classification, and will provide a rate of 35 per cent upon all the other textile machines.

That, I think, expresses it in a nutshell.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator, then, as saying that the class of machinery which he has now subjected to a 35 per cent rate would be, under the present amendment, subject to a 50 per cent rate?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; it would be subject to a 50 per cent rate except for this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. So the things to which the Senator is now applying the 35 per cent rate are included in the general terms of the present amendment, which applies a 50 per cent rate?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. So it is, as to those particular machines, a reduction from 50 to 35 per cent?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is right.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this matter, in the italicized part of this amendment the very identical language is used that is used in the part that is proposed to be amended. The amendment printed in the bill reads:

Thirty per cent ad valorem; knitting, braiding, and insulating machines, and all other textile machinery or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for, 50 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment now proposed reads "all other similar textile machinery." The Senator will notice that we have now inserted the word "similar," so that it can not be extended beyond that class of machinery.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator amends the italicized words by inserting the word "similar"?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we can not put in the two rates unless we separate them. The way it is now, if the Senator will notice, we say:

And all other textile machinery, or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for.

We take that out because of the fact that we want to make the duty on those things 35 per cent.

Mr. SMITH. I know you do; but the point I am making is, you use the same terminology when you say "other textile machinery or parts thereof." Unless you modify that you have a conflicting duty here in the two clauses. Here you have "knitting, braiding, and insulating machines, and all other textile machinery * * * 50 per cent ad valorem." In the next clause you have "all other machines or parts thereof, * * * 30 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. SMOOT. But if the Senator will follow the amendment closely he will find that it says "and all other similar textile machinery," referring back to the knitting and braiding and lace braiding and insulating machines. On all similar machinery of that kind the duty is 50 per cent, and on all of the other textile machinery the duty is 35 per cent.

Mr. SMITH. Do you put the word "similar" before the word "textile" in the italicized words?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; in the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; "and all other similar textile machinery," so that we will have the three classes: The machines bearing a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, and the machines which are limited here, bearing a duty of 50 per cent ad valorem, and the others 35 and 30.

Mr. SMITH. So that the word "similar" classifies it as applying to the knitting and braiding machinery?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. All right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator what disposition he intends to make of the ad valorem figure found in line 7 of the same paragraph?

Mr. McCUMBER. We leave that.

Mr. KING. The Senator proposes to leave that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that is not taken out—

All other machines or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for, 30 per cent ad valorem.

That has already been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. KING. I move to amend the amendment just offered by the Senator from North Dakota——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has not yet been offered. A motion has been made to reconsider.

Mr. KING. I supposed it had been reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on the reconsideration of the amendment heretofore adopted. [Putting the question.] The vote is reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer the amendment which has been read from the desk, and the Senator can offer his amendment to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the reconsideration having been ordered, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota—I can not give the line because I do not know the number in the text—by striking out the numeral "50" after the word "for" and before the words "per centum ad valorem" and inserting in lieu thereof "35."

While I have the floor, if I may offer two amendments simultaneously, I move to strike out the numeral "35" found in the last line of the tendered amendment and to insert in lieu thereof "25."

Now, Mr. President, just a word.

Of course, the purpose of the amendments offered by the committee, and of this entire paragraph relating to machinery, is to increase the opportunity of the domestic manufacturers to increase the prices of the articles embraced within the paragraph. I am sure the distinguished Senator from North Dakota does not anticipate any considerable revenue will be derived from the tax imposed by the amendment which he has just tendered. The object of it is not revenue. The purpose is to intrench more firmly the domestic producers, so that they may charge textile manufacturers greater prices, and the latter in turn will carry the increases into their finished product, and to the ultimate consumer, who will bear all these tariff duties and the intermediate, direct, and collateral advances.

It seems to me, in view of the fact that there ought to be a disposition to bring prices to a reasonably normal condition, that when we deal with what might be denominated the primary and fundamental products the duty ought to be placed as low as possible. If we desire to increase the number of mills and textile factories in the United States, we ought to afford opportunity to secure machinery and building materials as cheaply as possible. If by law prices are increased—prices which must be paid for machinery and plants and equipment—then, of course, the products of mills and factories must carry the burden until it is transferred to the consuming public, who in the last analysis pay the costs.

Mr. President, I perceive no reason for the imposition of a tax upon these articles, unless it be a slight one for revenue—and but little revenue would be derived—upon any of the machinery that is provided for in this amendment. We ought to permit these machines to come in free of duty or with a tariff for revenue purposes only. We ought to aid the textile mills in the United States in all legitimate efforts to increase production and bring prices down.

Why, Mr. President, since this bill has been before the Senate, and the manufacturers and beneficiaries of high protection have perceived the reactionary manifestations here, responding to the natural cupidity and greediness in human nature they have advanced their prices. I saw in last Monday's or Tuesday's papers that the Plate Glass Trust, since we had passed the provisions in the tariff bill relating to their product, had increased prices 20 per cent; and we learn from the press and from organizations that are attempting to measure the rise and fall in prices that there has been an increase of from 3 to 11 per cent in many manufactured products during the past month or six weeks. Why? Because manufacturers and domestic producers perceive that reactionary Republicans are in the saddle, and that they are going to give them the kind of a tariff bill they want, under which, intrenched in power and by the authority of law, they may continue their extortionate rates and their raids upon the pockets of the American people.

I submit that this is an unjust and unwarranted tax; it will of necessity increase the price of textiles, of clothing, and of the various articles produced in the textile mills of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah asked a very pertinent question. He asked whether we expected to derive any revenue from this item. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the calendar year 1921 we imported about four and a quarter million dollars' worth of the article. If we get an average of 35 to 40 per cent—and it runs from 35 to 50—I think we would get about $1,500,000 in revenue out of it.

So far as the protection is concerned, if it were for protection alone, I have an idea we could stand a lower rate of duty upon some of these articles. In other words, we make standardized machines in this country, and we can make the standardized machine at quite a reasonable rate as compared with what it costs others to make a machine. We have our machinery for the standardized machine and we undoubtedly export a considerable amount; but there are a great many machines of special make imported, and I think they will stand the rate of duty proposed. I believe the present duty is 20 per cent. We bring that up to 35 per cent, and that would give us a little more revenue, if we had the same importations, than we would receive under the present law, and of course the Senator agrees with me that we will need more revenue than we had at the time the old law was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this item, but my understanding is—and I get that understanding from conversations with cotton folks in my State—that there are a great many of the machines used in the cotton-textile industry which are not produced in this country at all. The kind of machines which are produced in this country are generally purchased in this country. It is largely the machines which are not produced in this country that are imported by the cotton-mill men of my State. So, as affects that class of machinery, it will be a revenue producer, but it will be a mighty high duty, I think.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit, of course, if it be true, as the Senator says, that many of the machines used in the United States are manufactured here and that only those which are not manufactured here are imported——

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not say only, but I say that is the rule; that the importations are almost entirely of that class of machines used in the textile industry which are not produced in this country.

Mr. KING. The Senator will see that if the tariff is applied to all grades of machines—to those manufactured in the United States as well as to those which are imported—it affords an opportunity for the domestic producer to increase the price.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly it will increase the price of the domestic machine as well as of the foreign machine.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from South Carolina knows so much more about the subject than I do that I would like to have him enlighten the Senate in reference to that.

Mr. SMITH. My observation of this debate has been that it is not a question of real, scientific, industrial welfare of the country we are looking after, but it seems to me the whole object is to listen to the special pleas of individuals who are engaged in a certain kind of work, without reference to the benefits which may be derived by the general public.

In reference to this particular matter in hand, some years ago, when we had the Payne-Aldrich bill under discussion, I took occasion to discuss the manufacture of textiles in this country and abroad. I have been informed that these relative conditions obtain now.

In this country we have applied improved machinery in textile manufacture to such an extent that in the manufacture of certain kinds of goods we have no danger of competition in the world, I believe I can state without fear of successful contradiction.

Mr. SMOOT. Particularly in cotton machines.

Mr. SMITH. Particularly with reference to cotton machinery, and it would apply in a large degree also to woolen machinery. We have advanced our application of machinery in the manufacture of these goods to where the human element, the costly element, is almost eliminated. Not to speak accurately, but approximately, in the matter of the looms, where the yarns have finally reached the stage of conversion into cloth, where it would take, in previous years, practically a grown, intelligent individual to every loom, a minor now can attend from 10 to 15 looms on account of the electrical automatic devices completed and installed.

As a matter of course, in the development of this machinery, the human element having been largely eliminated, the initial cost is about the only charge, because the upkeep is not nearly so great as the annual wage of an attendant of the loom. I have been informed that the production of this machinery in its applied form is largely under patent, and the only effect your tariff will have at all will be to give those who are operating under the patent monopoly an opportunity to raise the price still higher. I really believe that a scientific investigation of this question by those of us who are attempting to legislate for the best interests of the greatest number would result in our putting all of this machinery, which every year finds a still further development, upon a competitive plane for study by the geniuses of the world, in order that we might be the beneficiaries of the best brain of the country. But when on the water's edge you erect a tariff wall, and restrict the investigation of genius to American enterprise, you will have done what England to-day is the victim of; that is, the operatives of the English cotton mills have refused to accept anything but a wage based upon the pieces turned out, so that the installation of improved machinery in the English mills did not inure to the benefit of the English owner, because if one man could attend 10 times as many looms as he erstwhile did and turn out a hundred pieces more, he got paid per piece, and his wage was the same as that of the 10 men it took to attend the old looms. Therefore anything like the installation of new machinery was discouraged.

You are attempting to do by this bill that identical thing. I guarantee the assertion that in the textile mills of this country there is not a loom or a piece of manufacturing machinery the minutiæ of which have not become obsolete in 24 months. It is very much like the means of communication by electricity. First, there was the crude telephone, then the long distance and the relay telephone, then the wireless, and heaven only knows where the final development of this means of communication will stop. How foolish it would be of us, while the geniuses of the world, not for dollars and cents, but for the perfection of that means of communication, are vieing with each other to give to mankind the best that could be found, to erect a tariff wall, and count the brain of man in dollars and cents, and cause our citizens to be restricted to the peculiar discoveries of America.

It is true that there might be, and doubtless will be, incidental revenue, but can you measure the benefit to the American manufacturing public in the articles to which this special machinery would be applied? Can you measure what benefits would accrue in the development of our manufacturing industries, by the side of the revenue you would get?

Do you know that in this country our wool clip, being not more than sufficient, if sufficient, for the uses of America, does not enter into consideration, but when you consider that America is the home of the production of cloth textiles for countries the populations of which are 900,000,000, your attention must be challenged. There is not a spot on the habitable globe that can make a pound of cotton in competition with the peculiar quality of that known as the American middling upland. We have a monopoly of it. Nine hundred million people are dependent for adequate clothing on the Southeastern States of North America, and yet we are manufacturing scarcely more than one-half of an average crop.

Liverpool, Bremen, Barcelona, Genoa, Munich, all the markets of the world, buy American cotton and pay the marine insurance and the transcontinental freight. In other words, under the old contract, including cost, insurance, and freight, it would be carried 3,000 miles away, manufactured in the other country, brought back here, and sold in competition with American cotton goods. There is something radically wrong about a situation of that kind.

But I do not care to go into that phase of it now. What I am pleading for is this: America ought to spin every pound of American cotton and sell it in the finished product.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if this 50 per cent duty, or 35 per cent, as the case may be, on the machinery used by the American spinner, does not put a burden upon the operations of our textile manufacturing industry, and does it not incidentally inure, in the last analysis, for the benefit of our competitors, the European manufacturers?

Mr. SMITH. That is a very pertinent question which the Senator from North Carolina asks, and every intelligent business man would know that a 50 per cent duty upon the necessary machinery to be used in the conversion of our raw material into the finished product would be a tremendous burden, if the life of the machine which he gets was 10 or 15 years; but, as I indicated in the beginning of my remarks, these machines are changed radically from year and year, and new devices are installed. So that this competition in the form of replacement goes on from year to year, and there would not be possibly a greater handicap to the further development of the manufacture of American raw material on American soil than this very duty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, it is not advisable even from the standpoint of protection or the standpoint of revenue.

Mr. SMITH. It is not advisable. Let us take the very argument of our friends on the other side that they want American resources for Americans first. The resources of America are so vast that they constitute almost an inexhaustible supply of raw material. Every man will admit that the finished product is enhanced in commercial value incalculably over the raw material. Therefore it should be the duty of every statesman and every right-thinking American to convert the American product as nearly as possible into the finished article in order to get that accrued value. Yet at the risk of preventing the manufacture of the finished American article it is proposed to place a 50 per cent duty on the things so necessary to convert the raw material into the finished product.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator's argument apply not only to the machinery used in our manufacturing industries but also to the implements and machinery used by the agricultural industry.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, I think there is no question at all that when we come to the application of the doctrine of protection to the agricultural implements which the farmer uses they ought, without any dispute by all parties concerned, to be put upon the free list. Everyone knows that the tariff can not affect the man who is not in a position to name the price of the article which he sells, only incidentally where the production is so small and so valuable that articles of similar character but not of the same quality do not compete.

Getting back to the proposition of a tariff of 50 per cent on the very phase of machinery which manufactures in its most delicate form the American finished article, let me say this: I have had occasion to look into the textile schedule; I am studying it now, and I find that of the importations of certain cloths at least 60 per cent are of the finest kind of manufacture. We have driven the world out of the markets of the manufacturing world with certain forms of ordinary manufactured cotton goods. Now, we can manufacture as fine cotton goods as any people in the world. We start out with the handicap in our favor of having the production of the raw material at the door of the mill. Open up and give us the benefit of the world's genius and the world's inventive power in perfecting the machinery which will convert this raw material into the finest finished product, and it will be only a few years until every form, from the coarsest domestic cloth to the finest lace goods, will be made upon the very field and on the ground where the raw material is produced. I can not understand by what process of reasoning it is proposed to put a 50 per cent duty on that which would ultimately make us the masters of the manufactures of our own products.

At some other time I propose to take up the matter and discuss it, not for the purpose of delaying its legislation but my duty impels me as a Senator in this body, representing in part my State and in part the whole United States, to enter my protest against this indiscriminate and senseless placement of duty upon those things so necessary for the production of the raw material and the conversion of the raw material. I do not believe there is a country in the world that even now can compete with us in the cheapness of the production of the staple articles the people use. I wish each Senator had the time to go into our manufacturing plants and see the marvelous supplanting of the human element by the machine element. The cost is cut more than 50 per cent in practically all the leading manufactories of the country by the installation of the wonderful devices of genius. The producing power of a skilled American mechanic is comparable to the producing power of 10 foreigners, and were he to get a wage five times that of his foreign competitor his production per man is so infinitely greater than that of his foreign competitor that his wage sinks into insignificance in comparison. I have sat here from day to day and listened to some Senator compare the volume of production by an American producer with that of a foreigner, but no statistics have been forthcoming.

In the matter of which we were just speaking, cotton manufacturing, a little girl 15 or 16 years of age can turn out in finished bolted cloth what it would have taken from 10 to 12 adult men to turn out a few years ago and what it now takes 10 or 11 foreigners to produce, and yet we would measure the wage of the American laborer by the wage of the foreigner. Do we measure the volume of production of the American laborer by the volume of production of the foreigner? No. Where does the difference go? It goes into the pockets of the manufacturer. He would have you come in here and say that the American wage is high, but God knows I for one do not believe it is high enough. I stand here in my place now and say that the American laborer, under the genius of our Government, with the wonderful capacity for production that has been manifested in the application of mechanical devices, is entitled to divide the wonderful wealth that flows from these machines.

As I started to remark, I believe that we should get the statistics and see just what in America is produced per man of a given article as compared with the foreigner. Then, taking that article and the element of cost as to what the man produces here and the element of cost as to what the man produces abroad, we would find that we could treble the American wage and still meet the competition of the world.

Mr. KING. So that the wage is rather unimportant in that respect?

Mr. SMITH. The wage in the American element is largely unimportant. I am speaking of certain classes of manufacturing. Of course, there are some which do not lend themselves readily, but I do not recall many. The only place where the human element will be the same from time immemorial is in certain forms of our agricultural production, and even there think of what one man can produce to-day in the wheat fields of the West as compared with 50 years ago. The reaper and binder and threshing machine move with a minimum of human effort and maximum of machinery, cutting to-day 500 per cent more than could be cut by one man then.

Who are the beneficiaries of this improved machinery? Does labor get it? Does the man get it who sits upon the tractor and holds the throttle, or the other one who guides the blade as it clips the wheat, or the two or three who are stacking the wheat? Do they get as much in the aggregate as even the farmer who threw the old-fashioned scythe? I suppose the one got $5 or $6 a day and reaped 30 acres, while the other got 50 cents a day and reaped an acre.

Who is the beneficiary of the application of these wonderful devices, the product of the human brain? Need I ask the question who are the beneficiaries? The number of multimillionaires in America to-day is greater than the number of men who possessed thousands 50 years ago. The manner in which the man who gets hold of these forces can multiply his wealth is a matter of geometrical progression. It does not behoove us, sitting here to-day with the freedom of the times, with our wonderful devices for production, to handicap the development of this country and to cavil at the wage of the laborer who puts into operation this wonderful machinery, by an iniquitous tariff which piles up all the fabulous profits to the man engaged in the business.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that those who are responsible for this paragraph will not insist upon the 50 per cent rate. I do not know who was responsible for having it put here. Doubtless it was the manufacturer of some machinery approximating some of this and hoping some time to develop it. I hope the chairman of the committee will reduce this tremendous rate. He can not accuse me of having occupied any time in the discussion of the matter. As a representative in part of that section of the country engaged in the use of the machines herein indicated, I appeal to him to give us a tariff which will enable us to manufacture the American raw material by American machinery.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I stated in a very brief manner a short time ago that our standardized machines, the kind which have just been discussed by the Senator from South Carolina, are not the machines in which there is serious competition. I do not think a tariff of 50 per cent ad valorem upon a special class of machines, as it is limited here, has the slightest thing on earth to do with the price of those machines which are used by the great cotton establishments in the State of the Senator. There are a number of knitting machines, braid-making machines, and machines of that character which do come in serious competition with like machines in the United States. There is where the competition exists.

I have stated that the standardized machine made in the United States finds little competition. The special kind of machine finds very much competition, as is shown by the more than $4,000,000 worth of those kinds of machines coming into the United States. I have the testimony before me, without going into the detail, of a number of witnesses who testified as to the labor cost of their particular machines. After one of those machines is put up, of course it reduces, and immensely reduces, the labor cost in the production of the thing for which the machine is made, but the machines which come in competition with our machines are machines in which the testimony shows there is about 800 per cent of the cost of the manufacture in the labor.

We are trying to make those machines in the United States, and as to them there is competition. We want the little revenue obtainable, and I think that 35 per cent is a very low duty. Where we have given 35 per cent, we have very considerable testimony showing the necessity for more than 50 per cent. This rate is reasonable and will not affect the cost of the great machines which are used in the weaving of cotton.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to put into the record a few figures and make a few observations. I feel incompetent to discuss this question in the presence of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], whose familiarity with textile machinery and with the development of our textile industry in the United States enables him to speak with the authority of a prophet. His eloquent and learned exposition of certain phases of the tariff question, especially as involved in the consideration of the items now before us, was illuminating and impressive. I only regret that there were not more Senators present to hear what the Senator said.

Mr. President, if the position of my friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] could be crystallized into legislation or if he would suggest legislation that would crystallize his position into law, some of the arguments employed against this provision would be weakened. The Senator states that we import certain grades of machines; that those machines are not manufactured in the United States or, at least, that the manufacture of them here is inconsiderable; that the great proportion of the textile machinery employed in the United States is made here; and that there is no competition to be expected from the foreigner with respect to that character of machinery.

Unfortunately, however, Mr. President, the amendment offered by the able Senator is not confined to the grades of machinery which are imported but it extends to all kinds, to the domestic production as well as to the imported products. This means that there will be placed in the hands of the domestic manufacturers of textile machinery, under the operation of this amendment, a weapon which he may employ against the domestic purchaser and user of his machinery, by means of which he may raise the price above a reasonable and fair margin of profit to the limit fixed by the duty of 50 per cent or 35 per cent or 30 per cent, dependent upon the character of the machinery, as provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. If the Senator would modify his amendment so that it would tax the imported grades only and not apply to the standardized machinery manufactured in the United States or to the grades of textile machinery manufactured in the United States, then, as I said at the outset, much of the ground of criticism against this article would be removed. But, of course, the Senator from North Dakota will not do that; and his failure in that respect is convincing evidence that the amendment is designed not alone to secure a little revenue but to afford high protection to the domestic manufacturers of textile machinery.

The able Senator from South Carolina has demonstrated how the impediments resulting from unwise and impolitic tariff legislation operate as obstacles to the world conquest in that part of the textile field which we denominate cotton textiles. It must be apparent to every thinking person that if we increase the cost of the machinery to the builders and operators of textile mills they are at a disadvantage with their foreign competitors. Whatever will enable them to produce textiles cheaper will increase their opportunities for world conquest or at least to expand their trade in foreign nations.

The Senator from South Carolina has called attention to the fact that by the adoption of a wise domestic policy we would consume substantially all cotton produced in the United States, and we would be the vendors of cotton textiles in other nations of the world instead of having Great Britain and other nations after coming here for their cotton becoming our competitors in the world. Our policy should be to aid our manufacturers, so that they can enter the world's markets and find an outlet for the great surplus of commodities which the United States can produce. A wise policy, a proper tariff law, will naturally aid America in its foreign commerce. This will react to the advantage of the American people and greatly increase the wealth of the American people.

Mr. President, in the year 1920 we exported $20,919,634 worth of textile machinery, thus demonstrating that there is no fear of foreign competition. During 1913 the exports of textile machinery amounted to nearly $2,000,000, and in 1919 they were of the value of $15,000,000. In 1920 our exports amounted to $21,000,000. The Federal census shows the production of textile machinery in the United States in 1914 to have been of the value of $30,437,689.

Mr. President, I have shown that the exports of textile enterprises in 1920 were nearly $21,000,000. Let us see how pitifully small the imports have been. In 1915 they amounted to $305,892; in 1916, $1,104,087; in 1917, $1,103,647; in 1918, $809,650; in 1919, $1,135,656; and in 1920, $2,842,110. The able Senator from North Dakota indicated a larger importation in 1921, as I understood the Senator, approximately $4,000,000. I would not regard that as an unmixed evil; upon the contrary, if the Senator's statement is accurate—and I have no reason to question it—it would indicate a revival in the United States in certain textile lines of industry which called for that peculiar grade or kind of machinery which the Senator says is imported into the United States.

I do not regard it as an unmixed evil; upon the contrary I regard it as highly beneficial that there should be imports into the United States, not in one line of industry alone but in many lines of industry. I deny the wisdom of the view announced by some of our Republican friends that the height of domestic felicity and prosperity will be reached when we cease to import anything from other nations. Imports secure us exports; they furnish markets for our surplus products; and, aside from that, Mr. President, imports tend to restrain the greed, the cupidity, and the avarice of the American producer, because he knows that if he gets beyond all reasonable or unreasonable limits, then there may be a domestic revolt against his avarice and his greed, the flow of imports from abroad will increase, and he will be forced to sell his products at a lower level. Imports tend to a reduction of prices, that is why so many predatory manufacturers want prohibitive tariff.

Of course, our domestic producers are doing everything they possibly can, exerting all the pressure within their power, to raise this tariff wall, to tax these items which are found in this bill—and they comprise practically everything that enters into the lives of the people—as high as possible, in order that they may bar out any possible competition.

Under the head of "Machines for making lace, net, and braid"—and machines of that character are embraced within the first part of this amendment—it is stated in the Tariff Survey:

> There is no domestic production of lace machines. The demand is somewhat limited; there would be considerable expense necessary to design and develop so complicated a machine, and competition would be met from the large and long-established firms of England and France.

And under the head of "Foreign production" this statement occurs:

The selling price in the United States of a 300-inch lace-curtain machine is given as about $40,000, compared with $28,000 to $30,000 before the war. Warp-lace machines of a certain type are sold in Germany at $1,750.

How apparent it must be to the most superficial observer that if we are compelled to pay $40,000 or $28,000 to $30,000 for a machine of this character, prices that are so high as to be indefensible, it offers an impediment to our competing with the foreigner in the manufacture of the kind of lace made by that particular pattern of machine; so that the imposition of these high rates of duty reacts upon the manufacturer in the long run, limits his production, curtails his foreign market, and to that extent injures the American working people and reduces pro tanto the prosperity of the American people.

Under the acts of 1894 and 1897 lace machines were included as manufactures of metal not specially provided for. * * * By the act of August 5, 1909, lace machines were admitted free of duty until January 1, 1911.

Even the Payne-Aldrich law admitted them free of duty.

After that date the duty reverted to 45 per cent. The act of 1913 reduced the duty to 20 per cent. The temporary removal of the duty in 1909 resulted in a large importation, which greatly stimulated the lace and embroidery industries in the United States.

That statement fortifies the argument of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Give to the textile manufacturers cheaper machinery and they will produce larger quantities of textiles, and with increased production there will be increased prosperity.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have suggested allows too high a tax; but it does seem to me that even our Republican friends, wedded to the idol of protectionism, ought to support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 3 of the proposed amendment of the committee as printed, it is proposed to strike out "50" and in lieu thereof to insert "35."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On the last line of the amendment, as proposed by the committee, it is proposed by the Senator from Utah to strike out "35" and in lieu thereof to insert "25."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire in a parliamentary way: That does not involve the amendment found on line 7 of the text?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. That has already been agreed to.

The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the amendments which the Senator has just submitted, if he is to preserve any sort of parity should there not be an amendment on line 7?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; because this amendment applies to all above that, and that is a clause by itself. The clause reading "all other machines or parts thereof, finished or unfinished, not specially provided for, 30 per cent ad valorem," still remains.

Mr. KING. Even if you include items in a basket clause there ought to be some sort of relationship between the basket clause and the specific or higher rates which may be found where the items are specifically enumerated.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is the basket clause which is 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KING. I comprehend.

Mr. McCUMBER. That covers all of them.

Mr. KING. But the Senator thinks there is a proper relationship between the rate fixed in the basket clause and the rates fixed for the other items?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I think so, because the others are more of a specialized character, and possibly demand a higher rate.

Mr. President, on the same page, line 5, before the word "all," I move to insert:

Combined adding and typewriting machines, 30 per cent ad valorem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Following the amendment already agreed to——

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the line?

Mr. McCUMBER. Line 5, after the words "ad valorem," just before the word "all."

Mr. McCUMBER. Page 84.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the amendment already agreed to at that place, and before the word "all," it is proposed to insert the following:

Combined adding and typewriting machines, 30 per cent ad valorem—

And a semicolon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether these commodities have been dealt with in some other section or paragraph?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not this particular commodity. There are certain machines, I think, that are upon the free list, but under paragraph 1541 typewriters are on the free list. Under the basket clause of paragraph 372 adding machines will be dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem. Since this machine is a typewriter which adds and lists figures—that is, an adding typewriter or bookkeeping machine—the question probably would arise as to where it should be properly classified. To prevent litigation, therefore, and to make the intent of the committee perfectly clear, this separate classification is proposed. This machine, which is neither a typewriter nor an adding machine in the strict sense of the word, but combines the essential features of both of these machines, might by some stretch of the imagination be classed as either, and it is therefore separately classified and given the same rate of duty that is provided in paragraph 372 for machines not specially provided for.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator why he believes a tax should be imposed upon the machines provided for in this amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the same duty that is given to other calculating machines. It is really an advanced calculating machine. It is a machine which not only does calculating, but also has a sort of a typewriting attachment in connection with it for making out lists, and so forth, so that it combines all the features of the calculating machine with those of the typewriting machine.

Mr. KING. Is it not manufactured by the Patterson cash register plant, of Dayton, Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it is made in Newark, N. J.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to my colleague that one that I think is a great deal better than this is made in Germany. I saw the advertisement of it some time ago, and it did not seem to me possible that it could accomplish what it claims. I thought it would revolutionize the work of some of the large banks, and I wrote to Germany in relation to it, and I got an answer, and really it does everything but speak.

Mr. KING. Does not my colleague think we ought to have it here if it is so advantageous in business activities?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think so; and I think that any man or any business that can use one of these machines can afford to pay to the Treasury of the United States 30 per cent on it. Really, I hope to see these machines come here, and I hope to see them manufactured in the United States, if possible, because they are wonderful machines.

Mr. KING. I hope the advertisement to which my colleague refers accurately stated the virtues and the merits of this particular mechanical, if not to say human, contrivance.

Mr. SMOOT. I never saw one like it here in my life.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not discussing the principles involved in the imposition of reasonable rates upon articles imported into the United States, particularly where revenue can be derived; but in view of the revelations with respect to typewriter companies and some of these large organizations that produce the cash registers—organizations which are monopolistic in their operations—I am not willing to support a tax that increases their power and puts more teeth into their mouths by which they may tear and rend the American people. It seems to me that the rate prescribed here is for protection, or rather for profit, instead of for revenue, and is intended to enable the manufacturers to charge the people of the United States for the product a price out of all proportion to its value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, on the same page, page 84, line 22, "metallic magnesium and metallic magnesium scrap," the House gave a duty of $1 per pound. I wish to modify the Senate committee amendment, which was 50 cents, so that it may be 40 cents. That is, I desire to strike out "50 cents," on line 22, and make it read "40 cents."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not know that the Senator was going to take up that item. It may be on his list, but if it is it had escaped my attention.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; it is on the list.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire to detain the Senate long with reference to that item, but there are some observations that I want to make and some data that I desire to submit. I really have not those data at hand just at this time, however, and I shall be very glad if the Senator from North Dakota will let the amendment go over until Monday morning.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator has no objection to reducing the rate from 50 to 40 cents per pound, has he?

Mr. SIMMONS. None whatever, except——

Mr. MCCUMBER. Suppose we do that, and then the Senator can bring up the matter later. I will reconsider the action for the purpose of any reduction he desires to make.

Mr. SIMMONS. With that understanding, I am perfectly willing that the reduction may be made now; but on Monday I shall probably ask for a reconsideration, and I understand that the Senator will not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from North Dakota has a right to make the modification.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; I will make the modification, then, at this time, as that is a committee amendment, and allow it to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not preclude any other amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 22, page 84, change the numeral "50" to "40."

Mr. MCCUMBER. On page 85, line 1, on behalf of the committee I move to substitute "40" for "50."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 85, line 1, strike out "50" and insert "40," so as to read:

Magnesium alloys, powder, sheets, ribbons, tubing, wire, and all other articles, wares, or manufactures of magnesium, not specially provided for, 40 cents per pound on the metallic magnesium content and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. I had intended, when we reached that item, to move, if the parliamentary situation permitted, the striking out of the 20 per cent ad valorem if a specific rate were attached; but if the specific rate were reduced to 25 cents, then I did not intend to move to strike out the ad valorem rate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. This reduces the specific to 40 cents, and the Senator can make his motion either now or at a time more agreeable to him.

Mr. KING. I shall wait until the able Senator from North Carolina is ready to proceed with the matter.

Mr. MCCUMBER. May we adopt both those amendments now, and then if the Senator wishes to have either of them reconsidered at any time in the future I will consent to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment as modified was, on page 85, line 1, to strike out "50 cents" and to insert in lieu thereof "40 cents."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I desire now to go to paragraph 379 on the same page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In paragraph 379, page 85, line 23, the committee proposes to strike out the word "bronze" and to insert:

Aluminum or tin foil less than six one-thousandths of an inch in thickness, 35 per cent ad valorem; bronze.

Mr. KING. Did the committee submit an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They did not.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota the reason for the introduction of this amendment? It does not seem to have attracted the attention of the House committee, though they had before them the consideration of the subject of aluminum, with all of its variations. The amendment just offered imposes a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem upon aluminum or tin foil less than six one-thousandths of an inch in thickness. As we know, aluminum is produced in great abundance in the United States by an organization which, so far as I know, by common consent is denominated the "Aluminum Trust." I suppose the contention will be made, if it has not already been made, that the aluminum or tin foil in the item just referred to is not manufactured by the Aluminum Trust. I presume the contention will be made that the trust produces metallic aluminum in blocks or bricks and disposes of the same to the manufacturers of various aluminum products, and that this particular item is manufactured by corporations but not by the trust.

I would like to inquire of the Senator what justification he can find for taxing this commodity. The Senator knows that aluminum in tin foil form is used in great quantities for the wrapping of soap, candies, gum, and many other articles, including some medicines; that aluminum from which the wrapping article is produced is manufactured by a great trust. I can not quite comprehend how the Senator justifies the high rate laid upon the commodity in question. Some of the bronze powders covered by the same paragraph are used for the painting of lacquer work, radiators, and many articles which are found in households, where the owners are men and women of but moderate means. Of course, there are some powders which are exceedingly valuable, and men and women of moderate means can not employ them, but those embraced within this particular paragraph are used by the poor people of the United States or by the people of moderate means.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not informed that there is such a thing as a tin foil trust in the United States. I do not know how many companies make this product. While tin foil, which is mostly lead, is made in considerable quantities here and elsewhere, of late years we are making an aluminum foil, which is very much better for some purposes than the lead or tin foil. I think the greatest quantity of it is used in wrapping chewing gum, and things of that character, and I think in that case they probably use more of the aluminum than of the old tin foil that was used in past years.

The reason for setting them out in detail here and giving a specific duty is that we wish to identify the particular articles which are coming in and take them out of the basket clause. Under the basket clause the rate would be 40 per cent ad valorem, while this amendment gives us a duty of 35 per cent. It is a revenue duty, and we hope to get some revenue out of it. It is chiefly a revenue duty.

Mr. KING. I stated a moment ago, and the able Senator has not quite met that point, that we have produced aluminum in great quantities here, and that there is an aluminum trust. I stated, and I presume the Senator has followed the suggestion which I made, that it would be contended that the production of aluminum or tin foil was not by the Aluminum Trust. I am not able to state whether it directly or indirectly produces this ordinary finished product, but I do know that the Aluminum Trust controls the aluminum market in the United States, and, of course, directly or indirectly, it controls this product.

I move to strike out "35" and to insert in lieu thereof "25."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 85, line 24, strike out "35" and insert in lieu thereof "25."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 25, to insert the words "aluminum powder, powdered foil," so as to read:

Bronze powder, aluminum powder, powdered foil, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 1, to insert the words "manufactured in whole or in part," so as to read:

Bronze powder, aluminum powder, powdered foil, powdered tin, brocades, flitters, and metallics, manufactured in whole or in part, 16 cents per pound.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry, and I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from North Dakota. I did not offer an amendment to the committee amendment just referred to, in which the words "aluminum powder, powdered foil," were inserted, because I intended at the appropriate time to move to strike out the numeral "16" and to insert a lower figure.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a committee amendment to that effect. I intend to move, on behalf of the committee, to strike out "16" and insert "12," and on line 3 to strike out "8" and insert in lieu thereof "6."

Mr. KING. Let us address ourselves to the first one. I understand that the committee has anticipated my amendment, or at least is reducing the rate reported in the bill. I inquire of the Senator if he tenders that amendment now?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was just about to offer it, but, of course, I want to have a vote on the amendment to insert the words "manufactured in whole or in part."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in line 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On behalf of the committee I move to strike out "16" before cents in line 2, and to insert in lieu thereof "12."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator why he adopts an ad valorem rate in dealing with aluminum, or tin foil, and a specific rate of 12 cents per pound, which, of course, is a very high rate, when he deals with bronze powder, aluminum powder, powdered tin, brocades, flitters, and metallics, manufactured in whole or in part, particularly where the items I have just read constitute commodities which are in common use in the ordinary household in the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. Paragraph 379 as agreed to by the House reads:

Bronze, powdered tin, brocade, flitters, and metallics, 16 cents per pound.

That was a specific duty. The committee did not desire to change the specific duty without some good cause, but the committee felt that it was rather difficult to get at the value by weight specifically, and that it was better to require an ad valorem duty. You may in some instances find it quite simple to have nothing but a specific rate, and, of course, wherever we can use a specific rate I think it is the better method, because you can get rid of the question of undervaluation and similar questions and you will always know what rate you are to get. There are a great many things as to which it is difficult to get a rate per pound or per yard or by any measure which will be adequate to cover the many forms in which the article will come in, and for that reason we followed the ad valorem rate on that specific item.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator has submitted an argument which has merit in favor of the specific as against the ad valorem duty, but our experience shows that a specific rate based upon high prices, war prices, prices far above normal, inevitably leads to injustice and oppression and gives a higher rate of protection and, therefore, imposes a higher tax than the ad valorem rate. The ad valorem rate, of course, is flexible. It rises and falls as the price of the commodity rises and falls, but the specific rate rests upon a sure foundation. A specific rate, upon the theory that these high prices are to be maintained, must of necessity operate as a heavy and intolerable burden of taxation upon the people. Why not give to the people the benefit of falling prices and fix wherever it is possible an ad valorem rate? Concede the superiority in many instances of the specific over the ad valorem because of the certitude that may there arise. Where we project into these peace times a tariff bill which is formulated when the high costs of war are still controlling, a great injustice is done, great inequalities are perpetuated, and oppressive burdens are laid upon the shoulders of the consuming masses.

Mr. President, this specific rate, I submit, is approximately between 40 and 50 per cent when reduced to its ad valorem equivalent.

Mr. SMOOT. It is less than 35 per cent.

Mr. KING. The Senator may be right. The last quotation that I saw was 28 cents a pound, which would be approximately 45 to 50 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that the price must have dropped considerably of late, because it was 35 cents in 1921, and 12 cents per pound specific duty on a 35-cent price is equivalent to about 34 per cent.

Mr. KING. Which value is my colleague taking—the foreign or domestic?

Mr. SMOOT. The foreign import price. The Senator will see, on page 522 of the Tariff Summary, that the importations for nine months of 1921 were 545,302 pounds, valued at $185,586. That is virtually 35 cents a pound; and a rate of 12 cents a pound on a 35-cent price is equivalent to 34 per cent ad valorem. It is true that if the price drops the ad valorem rate would likewise decrease.

Mr. KING. Of course, my colleague will admit that if the price should drop and we fix a specific rate the tax to the consumer is higher than if it were an ad valorem rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Looking back in the years 1908 and 1909, I find that the price of bronze powder, powdered tin, brocades, flitters, and metallics was 34.5 cents in 1908 and 31.4 cents in 1909. In 1909 the price was 29 cents, and declined to 27 cents in 1915, and then, of course, immediately rose to 60 cents and above.

Mr. KING. As a result of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. It reached a price as high as $1.44.

Mr. SMOOT. I said 60 cents and above.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word to show the nature of the products or commodities embraced in this amendment and the general use made of them. Some of the powders embraced in the amendment are used for explosive purposes, but the various bronze powders are used chiefly with a size or in oil, as a pigment in finishing brass beds, gilt frames, radiators, and other articles in imitation of gold or silver. Prior to the war about one-half of the domestic supply of bronze powders came from five plants, most of which were situated near New York; the remainder was imported. During the war domestic production increased so as to supply all domestic requirements and leave a small surplus for export. The number of plants increased from five to nine.

It is apparent that the rate of taxation which is imposed will permit the domestic manufacturers to increase the price of their commodities. I said to the Senator from North Dakota a few moments ago that these powders were largely used in the homes of people of moderate means. We know of the large number of gilt frames upon the walls, the radiators, and various metallic articles in the homes which are gilded with the powders or the bronzes here provided for. This means an additional tax.

I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "12 cents per pound" and inserting in lieu thereof "20 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say in response to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah that the prices under normal conditions and the cost of production, which undoubtedly is some index to the price under normal conditions, were relatively the same before the war and for a number of years after, and are of about the same relation to each other at the present time. With a duty of 12 cents per pound prior to 1914 or prior to the 1913 law, which really became effective in 1914, the foreigner imported just about one-half and the American produced about one-half of the American consumption. We have given a rate that is the same as the rate prior to the war, which was 12 cents per pound, and if the conditions remain relatively the same the foreigner undoubtedly can furnish at least one-half the supply of the American market.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment offered on behalf of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 86, line 2, to strike out "16" and insert "12," so as to read:

Powdered tin, brocades, flitters, and metallics, manufactured in whole or in part, 12 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment offered on behalf of the committee is on page 86, line 3, to strike out "8" before the word "cents" and insert "6," so as to read:

Bronze or Dutch metal, or aluminum, in leaf, 6 cents per 100 leaves.

Mr. KING. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the numeral "6" and inserting in lieu thereof the numeral "4."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 86, in line 3, in lieu of the amendment proposed to be inserted by the committee, the Senator from Utah proposes to insert "4," so as to read:

Bronze or Dutch metal, or aluminum, in leaf, 4 cents per 100 leaves.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 87, after line 7, I move to insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

PAR. 383b. Dynamite and other high explosives, put up in sticks, cartridges, or other forms, suitable for blasting, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one of the Senators on this side of the Chamber was going to discuss this matter, but he is absent. I shall not ask that it go over, but may I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota under what paragraph of the bill this item is now found?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is on the free list. I am informed it is in paragraph 1578.

Mr. KING. It was my understanding that it, as well as some other explosives, or some of the compounds used in explosives, were on the free list.

Mr. McCUMBER. At that time nitrate, which is the chief element in the manufacture of these explosives, was also upon the free list. We have now given a duty of 1 per cent per pound on nitrate, and that necessitates some increase upon the products into which nitrate enters. While the briefs of those who are manufacturers show a necessity for over 2 cents per pound compensatory duty, we have given them considerably less than that for reasons which we thought justified us in so doing, and fixed a rate of 1¼ cents per pound.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that there is practically no foreign competition in explosives?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand naturally that some of these explosives it would be rather dangerous to transport anyway, but I think that with a duty upon the nitrate of 1 cent a pound, it would induce a great many to manufacture the explosive and send it over here and take that chance, which they are not now taking. In other words, it should be remembered that the higher explosives are composed of from 80 to 90 per cent nitrate, and this would justify them in doing, with the duty on nitrate, what otherwise they might not attempt to do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment. I think it is a tax upon the farmers, upon the road builders, and, therefore, upon the counties, the States, and upon the Government itself, as well as upon the miners, upon those who are engaged in all forms of quarrying and mining operations. There is no possible competition from abroad. This amendment is a sop to the Powder Trust that has so greatly profited and prospered not only before and during the war but ever since.

Under the act of 1913 gunpowder and all explosive substances not specially provided for, used in mining, blasting, and artillery purposes were free. This may be denominated a rather low tax, but it is a tax and an unnecessary tax, and, to the extent that it is a tax, it is a burden upon the consumer.

Mr. President, we export not only gunpowder but all forms of dynamite and other explosives. For instance, the exports of gunpowder, including smokeless powder, prior to 1915 were more than 1,000,000 pounds annually; and for 1918 the exports were 229,000,000 pounds of the value of $179,000,000. There has, of course, been a diminution of our exports with the termination of the World War. With the end of hostilities in Europe, our great foreign market for explosives ceased, but there has been for many years a foreign market; and we have exported, as I have said, up to as high as 229,000,000 pounds of these explosives in one year.

Everybody knows that we produce in very large quantities and perhaps as cheaply or cheaper than any other country in the world all compounds required in the manufacture of explosives. Nitrocellulose or guncotton, which is the basis of smokeless powder, is produced in the United States in abundant quantities and at a very low cost. The cost, of course, would be small because we produce such large quantities of sulphuric acid; indeed, the production of sulphuric acid is far greater than the demand. We could produce enough sulphuric acid to satisfy the demands of the world and then export some to Mars and the other planets and starry orbs around us.

The production of dynamite in 1914 was more than 223,000,000 pounds. In the same year 65,000,000 pounds of nitroglycerin were produced. In 1919 there were manufactured 220 000,000 pounds of dynamite, and the exports of dynamite in 1914 were more than 14,000,000 pounds. In 1916 they were nineteen and a half million pounds.

It is evident, Mr. President, with respect to the items embraced in the amendment, that we produce not only sufficient for consumption but for export. There is no competition; there can be no competition unless, of course, the domestic prices were forced to such heights as to compel the cessation of purchasing here at home or so high as to induce foreign manufacturers to export to the United States.

I repeat that this tax is merely a gratuity to the Powder Trust. We have imposed a tariff upon nitrates, and now we must have the compensatory duty upon what might be denominated the finished product; but, even with the tariff upon one of these products essential in the manufacture of powder, I submit there is no justification for the duty upon the finished product.

I have some figures in my office—I did not know we should reach this item this afternoon, and I did not expect to discuss it or to present it—which show the vast amount of capital which is invested in the Hercules Powder Co. and in other powder corporations, together with the enormous profits which have been made by those organizations. They are not infant industries. There can be no plea made that they need protection or the fostering care of the Government. There can be no plea made as a justification for this tariff that the difference in the price of labor abroad and in the United States warrants the imposition of this tax. It is a mere gift, without rhyme or reason, to the Powder Trust of the United States; and the farmers, the miners, and thousands and millions of Americans who are compelled to buy explosives will be compelled to pay the tax which is thus imposed.

Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the numerals "1¼" and to insert in lieu thereof "one-half cent per pound."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment offered on behalf of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] on behalf of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the next paragraph, I think, which we passed over was paragraph 385.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Committee on Finance in paragraph 385.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 87, paragraph 385, line 9, after the words "Par. 385," to strike out "Nickel, nickel oxide," and to insert "Nickel oxide, 1 cent per pound; nickel, and nickel," so as to read:

PAR. 385. Nickel oxide, 1 cent per pound; nickel, and nickel alloy of any kind in which nickel is the component material of chief value, etc.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance if there is not some duplication in this paragraph? I invite the Senator's attention to paragraph 377, which reads:

German silver, or nickel silver, unmanufactured, 20 per cent ad valorem.

I may be in error, but it occurs to me that there is some confusion or at least some duplication. Would not nickel and nickel alloy of any kind in which nickel is the component material of chief value be embraced within paragraph 377?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that nickel silver only contains about 18 per cent of nickel oxide.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The copper, of course, in the nickel silver is its component material of chief value. So there can be no conflict whatever in these two provisions; and the junior Senator from Utah will see that the committee has made the change in this paragraph by only imposing a duty of 1 cent a pound upon nickel oxide, and then the duty on nickel and nickel alloy of any kind in which nickel is the component material of chief value is reduced from 5 cents a pound to 3 cents a pound. Then, on castings, wire, tubes, tubing, and so forth, the committee has reduced the rate from 30 per cent ad valorem on the American valuation to 25 per cent on the foreign valuation.

On nickel and nickel alloy of any kind in which nickel is the component material of chief value, in pigs, and so forth, the duty under the present law is 10 per cent, where based on the value at present prices the amendment now proposed by the Senate committee is just a trifle more than 10 per cent. I am informed, indeed, that it is a little less than the rate provided by the existing law. The question which I had in mind was 28 cents, as I stated the other day, but I am informed now by an expert of the Tariff Commission that 35 cents is the price to-day, and that the very lowest price at which it can be bought in quantity is 30 cents. Ten per cent of that is 3 cents, the exact rate which we provide here on shot, cubes, grains, and so forth.

I will say to my colleague that I asked that this paragraph go over for the very purpose of making a change, because I thought it was out of proportion as it was originally reported. I notice the quotations of June 20, 1922, show the price of shot and ingots to be 36 cents and the electrolytic 39 cents a pound, so that the rate proposed is considerably less than the rate of the Underwood law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not delay a vote upon this paragraph, although I want to say to the Senator I shall reserve the right before the bill leaves the Committee of the Whole to offer another amendment. At the present time I desire to move to amend in line 11 by striking out the numeral "3" and inserting in lieu thereof the numeral "2."

Mr. SMOOT. That is in line 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a committee amendment previous to that which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the beginning of paragraph 385, on page 87, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "nickel, nickel oxide" and insert "nickel oxide, 1 cent per pound; nickel, and nickel."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same paragraph, on page 87, line 11, after the word "ingots," to insert "shot, cubes, grains, cathodes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, in line 12, before the word "cents," to strike out "5" and insert "3."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not offer an amendment to that amendment at this time, but I will say to the Senator that later I shall do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same paragraph, on page 87, line 13, after the word "strands," to insert "castings, wire, tubes, tubing."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator what is the necessity of adding those words to the paragraph?

Mr. SMOOT. Castings, wire, and so forth, have always been in the basket clause heretofore. We have put them in paragraph 385 in order that statistics may be collected showing the amount of the importations of each article and what the cost may be or the foreign value, and so that each and every item named may be classified.

Mr. KING. Of course, taking them out of a basket clause——

Mr. SMOOT. The rate in the basket clause is higher than the rate proposed here; in fact, the rate under the basket clause is 35 per cent, while the rate proposed in this instance is 25 per cent.

Mr. KING. Does the committee intend to maintain the rate of 35 per cent in the basket clause?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the basket clause will have to maintain that rate, because it takes in a number of items and some of the items at least would have to bear a 35 per cent rate or even more. The Senator knows that in a basket clause every item can not be covered with the exact rate which may be proper, nor can there be specified in a tariff bill the items that fall in the basket clause, even though we know what they are. Even a tariff bill is not long enough for that.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out the numerals "25" and to insert in lieu thereof the numerals "20," in line 14, on page 87. Perhaps, however, I have anticipated the committee amendment previous to that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment beginning in line 13, after the word "strands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same paragraph, on page 87, line 14, before the words "per cent," to strike out "30" and insert "25."

Mr. KING. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "25" and inserting in lieu thereof "20."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of "25" it is proposed to insert "20."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask now to turn to page 90, lines 1 and 2. This amendment is designed to reinstate the wording of the old law. The House made a change in that by providing that the assay of the sample should be by wet assay without deduction; and we ask to strike out the word "an," in line 1, and insert "a proper," and also to amend in line 2 by striking out "by wet assay without deduction."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 90, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "an" and to insert the words "a proper," and in line 2 to strike out the words "by wet assay without deduction."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire the purpose of these amendments and to what extent they modify existing law?

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment restores the language of the existing law. It does not modify it at all. The House bill did modify existing law. The Senate committee, after some discussion, thought we had better retain the old phraseology.

Mr. KING. Is the rate increased?

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not affect the rates at all.

Mr. KING. No; I see that the committee has not made any amendment to the rates.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have made no amendment to the rates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. The next amendment is in paragraph 391, and I will ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to explain it.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Paragraph 391, zinc, page 90.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether my colleague wants to know why the changes have been made or not, for I think he is sufficiently familiar with the zinc industry to know that the differentials we have placed here are the differentials that are required in each process of manufacturing the zinc after the imposition of the duty upon the zinc content of the ore.

On page 90 I move to strike out lines 7 to 19, both inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 90 it is proposed to strike out lines 7 to 19, both inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

PAR. 391. Zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs, and zinc dust, 1¾ cents per pound; in sheets, 2 cents per pound; in sheets coated or plated with nickel or other metal (except gold, silver, or platinum), or solutions, 2¼ cents per pound; old and worn out, fit only to be remanufactured, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not expect this paragraph to be reached this afternoon, and a Senator who is not in the Chamber was to submit some observations before a vote was taken.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the only objection I have heard to this amendment is that they want 1⅝ cents a pound on zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs, and zinc dust instead of 1¾ cents a pound. The zinc content of the ore we have given a duty of 1½ cents a pound, and the differential between 1½ cents a pound and 1¾ cents a pound is one-fourth of a cent a pound, or $5 a ton.

In my opinion—and I feel positive that I am right, after an investigation—the differential should not be more than $5 a ton for converting the zinc from the ore into blocks and slabs and pigs, or zinc dust; and I will say to my colleague that if he desires at any time to open up this question again I am perfectly willing for him to do it. The only objection to the amendment that I know of comes from the fact that they want a duty of 1⅝ cents a pound instead of 1¾ cents.

Mr. KING. I shall not ask that it go over. I want to make just an observation or two, and then I will offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I was not here when the subject of zinc ore was under consideration, and I ask now, for information, whether that has been disposed of by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. At 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. KING. That was my understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, 1½ cents a pound on the zinc content of the ore.

Mr. KING. Yes; so I presume that this amendment is for the purpose of accommodating the paragraph to the amendment which was adopted laying a tax of 1½ cents per pound on the zinc ore; that is, the zinc content.

Mr. President, I think that the rate fixed upon zinc ore of 1½ cents a pound, as stated by my colleague, was entirely too high; and, of course, this—what might be called a compensatory duty—I regard as likewise too high.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not object to the differential, does he?

Mr. KING. I am not objecting to the differential.

Mr. SMOOT. Because that is only one-fourth of a cent.

Mr. KING. So, of course, I should logically attack the duty upon the zinc ore; and if I succeeded there, then I should attack the rate here; but if I failed there, obviously there should be some differential, and I am not prepared to say that this is not a just and fair differential.

I desire, however, to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the fact that with respect to the items embraced in this paragraph the annual production is great and the importations are insignificant.

In 1910 the domestic production of zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs amounted to more than 269,000 tons.

In 1911 it amounted to 286,000 tons.

It continued approximately at that level until 1915, when the production was 489,000 tons.

In 1916 it was 667,000 tons. I am not giving the odd numbers.

In 1918 it was 517,000 tons; in 1919, 465,000 tons; in 1920, 463,000 tons.

During those corresponding years the imports, starting with 1910, were only 1,246 tons.

In 1911, 427 tons; in 1912, 10,000 tons; in 1913, 5,000 tons; in 1914, 583 tons; in 1915, 792 tons; in 1916, 663 tons; in 1917, 277 tons; in 1918, 35 tons; in 1919, 70 tons; in 1920, 15 tons; and in 1921, 6,000 tons.

So, Mr. President, it is apparent that there is no competition. Indeed, during a number of those years there were exports.

For instance, in 1914 we exported 64,000 tons.

In 1915 we exported 113,000 tons, which constituted 25 per cent of our production. That year there were only 792 tons imported, showing that our consumption was not equal to our production, and that we must have a market abroad if domestic production is to be maintained.

In 1916 we exported 193,000 tons; in 1917 we exported 201,000 tons; in 1918, 86,000 tons; in 1919, 121,000 tons; and in 1920, 102,000 tons.

The exports dropped in 1921 to between 2,000 and 3,000 tons.

These figures show that there is no justification for a duty upon this product. The revenue to be derived will scarcely pay for the expense of putting into operation the necessary machinery for that purpose. Then, what is the object of the duty? Why, manifestly it is to enable the producers of this commodity to swell the price. Zinc is an important commodity, and we now propose, when there is no competition, to impose this very heavy duty.

As I understand the amendment which is now tendered, we are to impose a tax of 1¾ cents per pound upon zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs, and zinc dust. That would be nearly $40 per ton duty. We do not impose a 20 per cent ad valorem or a 25 per cent ad valorem or a 10 per cent ad valorem duty, but we impose here a tax of between $35 and $40 per ton—$39.20, to be accurate. If the zinc is in sheets, then the tax is 2 cents per pound, or $40 a ton. If coated or plated with nickel or other metal except gold, silver, or platinum, or solutions, we impose a tax of 2¼ cents per pound, or $45 per ton.

Mr. President, what is the justification for these rates? They are not for revenue. They are not for protection. They are not imposed because there is an infant industry here, because the zinc mines of the United States have been in operation for more than a century. We are offering a gratuity to the zinc producers of the United States. I protest against these extortionate rates; and while I ought, if I am to be logical, to offer no amendment to this tendered amendment until a final disposition is made of the other paragraph dealing with zinc ores, I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I suggest an amendment.

I move to strike out, in line 1 of the tendered amendment, the fraction "¾," so that it will read:

Zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs, and zinc dust, 1 cent per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to strike out "1¾ cents" and to insert in lieu thereof "1 cent."

Mr. SMOOT. It would make the bill rather ridiculous to have a duty of 1 cent a pound on pigs, slabs, and zinc dust, when the Senate has already agreed to a duty of 1½ cents on the zinc content in the ore.

Mr. KING. I have admitted to my colleague that the suggestion was rather illogical; that I want to challenge attention to what I consider an oppressive tax and an improper rate. Later I shall attack the zinc ore paragraph and then renew the attack upon this one.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the better way would be to attack the rate on the ore when it gets into the Senate, and if the Senate changes its mind in regard to that rate, necessarily this rate would have to be changed. The committee will be glad to change it if the change is made in the rate on the ore.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to waiving a vote on this amendment. I only want to protest against what I conceive to be these very heavy, not to say oppressive, rates. I agree with my colleague, and I indicated that to be logical we ought to attack the rate upon the ore content first, and, if we fail in that, then I concede that there ought to be a proper differential in what might be denominated the finished product.

I will merely give notice, without pressing my amendment, that after we recur to the other paragraph dealing with zinc ore and have disposed of that I shall offer corresponding amendments to this paragraph with respect to all of the rates herein provided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in paragraph 392, page 90, line 24, to strike out "30" and to insert in lieu thereof "45," so as to read:

PAR. 392. Print rollers and print blocks used in printing, stamping, or cutting designs for wall or crêpe paper, linoleum, oilcloth, or other material, not specially provided for, composed wholly or in chief value of iron, steel, copper, brass, or any other metal, 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McCUMBER. On behalf of the committee I move to change "45" to "60" per cent.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation from the Senator with respect to that item. In the first place, the House fixed a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem. The Senate committee, after hearing evidence, doubtless, fixed the rate at 45 per cent, and now it is proposed to increase the rate to 60 per cent ad valorem. The Senator will remember that print rollers and print blocks are quite important, and I would be very glad to know the reason why there have been these progressive advancements in the rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, here are two print rollers [exhibiting]. They are used in the manufacture of wall paper. As many different rollers are used as there are figures and colors to be placed upon the paper. These rollers, when once made, of course will last as long as that pattern is required in the markets.

All the evidence received before us showed that it would require a tariff rate of about 100 per cent to equalize the cost of production in the foreign country competing with us and the cost of production in the United States. The wages which are paid to the experts who make these figures and place them upon these rollers are not excessive. Some of the rolls may run up as high as two or three hundred dollars in price. On rolls such as these before me I think the average will be from eighteen to twenty-two dollars, the kind that were imported, and it costs about $35 in the United States to make the same rollers. I am speaking of the costs and not the profits. It would therefore take nearly a hundred per cent to equalize the difference.

There are not very many men employed in this work, but it requires years of experience for them to become experts. The specialized labor in the United States is paid many times what it is paid in Germany and in central Europe, from which come the importations.

The request for this duty is urgently made by the men who perform the labor in producing these rolls. They ask a duty of 100 per cent. They have given us a full set of figures of exactly what they are paid per week, and what it costs to produce these rolls in comparison with what is paid the German experts for making the same things. Lately they are all, or practically all, coming in from Germany, and the workers in this country are almost all out of employment.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator about how many there are engaged in this business?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not state the number; at least, I do not recall just now if we have the figures. They are made by individual workers, who become expert in making these blocks for just one trade—that is, the manufacture of wall paper.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the technical name for the roll, or instrument?

Mr. McCUMBER. They are called print rolls. Those who manufacture wall paper make their own rolls. It is really a question of protection to the individual workman.

The manufacturers of wall paper had a contract with the union, in which they agreed to use only the union's products in the United States. There was then a strike, and evidently the strikers lost, because they went back to work under a very severe agreement, by which they withdrew their objection to the importations of these rolls and agreed, further, in order to maintain their own wages, that they would repair wherever repair was needed on the imported article. As soon as that agreement was made the manufacturers, who had the right to import, imported the articles at half price and threw nearly all of the workmen out of employment unless they would put their wages down to more nearly equal the German wages. This is one tariff duty, as I view it, which is entirely for the benefit of the workmen. There are not so many of them, but it means their life work.

Mr. KING. The Senator from North Dakota has made a plausible and perhaps strong argument in support of this amendment, but the facts, if I may amplify them a little, are that some manufacturers of wall paper and various other products which require patterns have been in the habit of manufacturing their own cylinders and pattern devices. As I understand, they found a domestic market for a portion of their products. Some of the employees felt that their wages were inadequate. I express no opinion upon that question. A strike ensued. The facts are that the manufacturers of wall paper and other products requiring patterns of this kind have been making large profits. When the strike occurred there were some importations by those concerns not manufacturing the rolls and patterns. Evidently the manufacturers saw that they might lose their domestic market, so they come to Congress and say, "We demand a tariff to keep out any possible competition."

This amendment is not for the purpose of securing revenue, but, as I conceive it, it is a scheme to permit a few of those who have been engaged in the production of these cylinders to increase the prices to those who are unable to produce them themselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 90, after line 24, I move to insert a new paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 90, after line 24, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

PAR. 392a. Cylindrical steel rolls, ground and polished, valued at 25 cents per pound or over, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. These cylindrical steel rolls come only from Czechoslovakia. The higher grades can not be made in the United States, nor in any other country that I know of. There are a few made in the United States of a cheaper grade, but we have not yet made them in the highest type of cylinders. Therefore it seems to the committee, those conditions existing and there being no chance of making them in this country, that the rate we have proposed is ample rather than to impose a higher rate. I do not think the Senator will object to this rate, on that account.

Mr. KING. If they are not produced in the United States and they are important in some of our factories, and Czechoslovakia is the only country that produces them, why does the Senator propose a tariff at all?

Mr. SMOOT. This is a revenue duty, pure and simple. That is all I have in mind in offering this amendment. They can not come from anywhere else. I think what few may come in of that character ought to bear a 25 per cent duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer a new paragraph to be inserted on page 90, after line 24. I send the paragraph to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 90, after the paragraph just agreed to, the Senator from North Dakota proposes to insert:

PAR. 392b. Twist drills, reamers, milling cutters, taps, dies, and metal-cutting tools of all descriptions, not specially provided for, containing more than six-tenths of 1 per cent of tungsten or molybdenum, 60 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to strike out the numeral "60" and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "30."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question? The steel which is used here—the alloys of tungsten and molybdenum—is a very expensive steel, and the bill as the committee originally reported it afforded no compensatory duty on the finished tools?

Mr. McCUMBER. It did not furnish a sufficient compensatory duty.

Mr. LODGE. No; and as these tools have to be made from this very high priced steel it is simply to give a fair compensatory duty to meet that rate?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is right. I understand the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] desires to be heard on this amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may say just a word before my colleague takes the floor, I am not prepared to state what this duty ought to be, but an investigation which I made some time ago demonstrated that, assuming the duty was to be placed on steel tools, it was perfectly clear in my mind that the committee had failed at that time to provide the necessary compensating duty. I am not prepared to say what that duty should be, but I felt perfectly clear that some injustice had been done.

Mr. LODGE. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, my attention was drawn to this item through correspondence with L. B. Webster, of the Cleveland Twist Drill Co.; William H. Eagn, of the Whitman-Barnes Co., of Akron, Ohio; and E. A. Noll, of the National Tool Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; which brought out the fact that under the bill as it stood there was a higher rate of duty provided on the raw material than there was on the finished product. I brought this to the attention of the committee, and the committee referred the matter to the Tariff Commission. I have a very complete report, which I shall not detain the Senate to read, but which would, I assure the Senator from Utah, in the view of the Tariff Commission justify the rate of 60 per cent. I think if I had the time to present the facts to the Senator he would not offer the amendment which he has proposed. I hope the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah will be defeated and that the rate of 60 per cent named by the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator from Ohio if, in view of the superior methods of production of steel in the United States and in view of the large profits made by the manufacturers of steel, he sees any reason why, because there is a duty imposed upon tungsten, there should be carried to what might be called the finished products, of which tungsten forms a part, this high compensatory duty?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I see that very clearly, because according to the computations made by the Tariff Commission the rate, as it stands in the bill as reported by the committee, on the materials out of which these high-speed tools are made would be very little over 60 per cent. The tools themselves would come under the basket clause in paragraph 393 at 40 per cent. It must be obvious to the Senator that it would not be possible to carry on the industry in this country with a higher rate, namely, 60 per cent, on the raw materials than we have on the finished product, namely, 40 per cent.

The question was presented to the Tariff Commission, and they have made a very carefully wrought out report, which I think fully justifies the rate of 60 per cent. I shall place the report in the RECORD, if I may have permission to do so, and not take the time to read it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, June 1, 1922.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR McCUMBER: Your letter of May 18 inclosing a copy of a letter received by Senator WILLIS from Mr. William H. Eagn, vice president of the Whitman & Barnes Manufacturing Co., Akron, Ohio, relative to proposed tariff duties on tungsten steel and tools made therefrom was referred to the experts of our metals division, and I take pleasure in inclosing herewith a memorandum on this subject prepared by Doctor Berglund.

Sincerely yours,
THOMAS O. MARVIN.

JUNE 1, 1922.

Subject: Duties on high-speed steel and tools containing high-speed steel.

In Mr. W. M. Eagn's letter of May 12, addressed to Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS and transmitted to the chairman of the Tariff Commission, with a letter from Senator McCUMBER dated May 18, it is contended that in the Fordney bill, as amended in the Senate, the rate of duty on high-speed steel containing 18.6 per cent tungsten amounts to $0.3146 on an import value of 50 cents per pound, or what would be equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 62.9 per cent. The calculation is expressed thus:

Under paragraph 304, 25 per cent of 50 cents equals	$0.125
Under paragraph 305, 10 per cent of 50 cents equals	.05
Under paragraph 305, 18 per cent of 72 cents equals	.1390
Total	.3146

Or 62.9 per cent of 50 cents.

Correcting a slight error in this calculation the figure for 18 per cent of 72 cents should be $0.1296 and the total duty $0.3046 instead of $0.3146. The ad valorem rate in consequence is reduced to 60.9 per cent of 50 cents.

It is further asserted that on tools made of high-speed steel the duty is only 40 per cent under the basket clause (par. 393). Mr. Eagn therefore holds that there should be either a reduction in the rate on the raw material (high-speed steel) or an increase in that of the tools containing this steel. In other words, the latter should have a rate equivalent to about 55 or 60 per cent ad valorem.

The ad valorem rate on imported high-speed steel depends upon the tungsten content and the price figure used. In the letter referred to the tungsten content is given as 18.6 per cent and the price 50 cents per pound. High-speed steels are usually made with a tungsten content of either 14 per cent or 18 per cent—very rarely with a tungsten content in excess of the latter figure. Assuming a price of 50 cents per pound, the rates on these two classes of high-speed steel under the Senate bill would be as follows:

	14 per cent grade.	18 per cent grade.
Under paragraph 304 25 per cent of 50 cents equals	$0.125	$0.125
Under paragraph 305 10 per cent of 50 cents equals	.05	.05
Under paragraph 305 14 per cent grade. .6 per cent allowed.
13.4 per cent of 72 cents equals	.096
Under paragraph 305 18 per cent grade. .6 per cent allowed.
17.4 per cent of 72 cents		.125
Duty on high-speed steel	.271	.300

Or 54.2 per cent on the 14 per cent grade and 60 per cent on the 18 per cent grade.

It will be observed that the ad valorem equivalents of the duties imposed are somewhat lower than that figured out in Mr. Eagn's letter (62.9 per cent).

It should be said in this connection that the price of high-speed steel (containing 18 per cent tungsten) in Great Britain, the country from which we get the greater part of the imported material, is 65 cents per pound rather than 50 cents per pound. Assuming a price of 65 cents per pound, the duty and its ad valorem equivalent may be stated thus:

Under paragraph 304, 25 per cent of 65 cents equals	$0.1625
Under paragraph 305, 10 per cent of 65 cents equals	.065
Under paragraph 305, 17.4 per cent of 72 cents equals	.1252
Duty on high-speed steel, 18 per cent tungsten, or 54.3 per cent of 65 cents	.3527

It will be noted that the ad valorem equivalents of the duties levied on high-speed steel tend to decline as the price increases because of the specific rate on the tungsten content above 0.6 per cent.

Tools made of high-speed steel are dutiable under the proposed act at a lower ad valorem rate than the steel of which they are made. The tools are governed by the rate in paragraph 393, which in the Senate bill is 40 per cent, while the steel is dutiable under paragraphs 304 and 305 at rates which, according to present prices, are equivalent to ad valorem duties ranging from 54 to 60 per cent.

It should be noted in this connection that the value of the high-speed steel used in the manufacture of these tools constitute a widely varying percentage of their total value. Taking the last August prices of well-known sizes of American twist drills made of 18 per cent tungsten steel and comparing them with the contemporaneous price of high-speed steel in the form of bars the results are as follows:

Twist drills made of high-speed steel.

(Morse taper shank or straight shank, taper length.)

Size	Price each.	Price per pound.	American price of high-speed steel.	Ratio of steel value to tool value.
			Per pound	Per cent.
¼ inch	$0.88	$5.00	$0.80	16
½ inch	1.60	5.80	.80	13.8
¾ inch	2.80	3.30	.80	24.2
1 inch	5.00	3.19	.80	25.8
1¼ inches	8.60	3.12	.80	25.6

In the case of certain twist drills, short set—jobbers' length—the prices per pound ranged from $6 to $250, and the ratio of raw material value to selling price was consequently much smaller, ranging from about 12 per cent to but a fraction of 1 per cent.

As there is considerable waste of steel in the manufacture of some of these tools the ratios of steel value to tool value are greater than the percentages here stated. Precise figures are difficult to give, because the amount of cutting done on the tool blank varies greatly, and in some drills the shank is made of carbon steel and only the drill itself of high-speed steel. Furthermore, in some mills the scrap or cuttings are remelted for further use without much loss, and in others are sold to steel mills at a considerable loss.

Since last August the prices of twist drills and other small tools into which high-speed steel enters have fallen more than the price of the steel itself. The American price of high-speed steel ranges from about 70 cents to 80 cents per pound, while the tools above tabulated are proportionately much lower in value. According to one dealer, the present—May, 1922—selling price of a 1-inch taper shank high-speed drill is $2.81. The same drill last August sold for $5. The amount of steel consumed in the manufacture of this drill is given as 2.96 pounds. At 70 cents per pound the cost of the steel utilized is $2.072. The scrap or cuttings in the process of manufacture amount approximately to 50 per cent. This scrap is sold at about 15 cents per pound, making about 21.2 cents that can be credited to recovery. The cost of the high-speed steel, therefore, utilized in the manufacture of a 1-inch taper shank high-speed drill amounts to $1.86, or 66.2 per cent of its present selling price.

It should be said in this connection that the present prices of small tools made of high-speed steel are disproportionately low. Ordinarily the value of the steel entering into the manufacture of small tools is much less than at present. Nevertheless, in the case of several important tools, the proportion of steel value to tool cost is large.

The small tool industry in the United States is a large one. While no figures are available regarding the total amount of capital invested in this branch of manufacture a conservative estimate would be from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000. A rough estimate of the number of employees in some 32 companies is 25,000 to 30,000. A considerable part of this extensive industry is intimately affected by the relative rates imposed on high-speed steel and the tools into which the steel enters.

In general, the following statements may be made:

1. At the present foreign prices of high-speed steel—50 to 65 cents per pound—the ad valorem equivalent of the duties imposed by the Senate bill ranges from 55 to 60 per cent.

2. Small tools like twist drills, reamers, and milling cutters are dutiable in the Senate bill under paragraph 393 at 40 per cent ad valorem.

3. The cost of the raw material (high-speed steel), of which some of the more commonly used of these tools are composed, constitutes a considerable percentage of the total expense of manufacture—in some cases under prevailing prices from 50 to nearly 70 per cent. An ad valorem rate of 40 per cent is therefore hardly compensatory in the case of some tools for the relatively heavy duties imposed on the steel.

4. In order to provide a rate on tools made in whole or in part of high-speed steel which would in all cases compensate manufacturers for the duties imposed on their raw material, a paragraph like the following might be inserted in the proposed bill:

"PAR. —. Small tools, including twist drills, taps, dies, reamers, milling cutters, and similar tools used in working on metal and containing more than 10 per cent tungsten, — per cent ad valorem."

The rate to be inserted would depend upon the degree of protection considered necessary for tools. For example, a rate of 45 per cent ad valorem would be at least compensatory in the case of drills whose raw material constituted 65 or 70 per cent of the total expense of manufacture, and would be more than compensatory, and to that extent protective, in the case of drills and other tools whose raw material constituted a smaller percentage of the total cost.

Comparative cost of manufacturing a 1-inch taper shank high-speed drill in England and the United States, under the assumption that high-speed steel will be increased in price in the event of the passage of the Senate bill by an amount equivalent to the tariff rate on high-speed steel, and that labor and other costs are the same in the two countries.

	England.	United States.
Present price of high-speed steel (18 per cent tungsten) per pound	[1] $0.60	[1] $0.70
Assumed price after passage of Senate bill	.60	.9527
Pounds of steel utilized in manufacture	2.96	2.96
Cost of steel in drill	1.776	2.819
Allowance credited to recovery	.212	.212
Net cost of high-speed steel in drill	1.564	2.607
Assumed labor and other costs [2]	.95	.95
Total cost of drill	2.514	3.557

[1] These prices are the lowest quoted.

[2] The difference between quoted price of taper shank drill in the United States at present time is $2.81 and the present net cost of the high-speed steel is $1.86.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not concede that because there is a duty imposed upon what might be called one of the primary products, of necessity there must be some compensatory duty carried to the finished product. The manufacturer of the finished product may have no competition whatever and could pay average prices or large prices because of the duties upon what might be called raw material for the same and still sell at a price that would give a profit, without having a tariff tax imposed upon the finished product.

Steel and many steel products, tools, and articles of that character, are produced in the United States under such favorable conditions that they could be sold at a profit without carrying a compensatory duty resulting from the rate given to tungsten and other alloys. I insist there is no reason for carrying through to the finished product what might be denominated this high compensatory duty. I think there is a good deal of fallacy in the contention that wherever a duty is allowed upon the raw material there must be a compensatory duty carried in all particulars and to the full limit to the finished product.

I ask for a vote upon the amendment which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment offered on behalf of the committee.

DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in 8-point type certain resolutions passed by the disabled veterans of the World War pertaining to the Veterans' Bureau and Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
STATE POST,
Los Angeles, Calif., June 17, 1922.

Hon. WALTER F. LINEBERGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At our State convention, held in San Diego May 15 to 20, inclusive, the inclosed resolutions were adopted, and we are again calling on your kindness to aid us in getting these resolutions before the proper bodies for execution. Knowing your deep interest in the disabled ex-service men, we feel that we could not place them in better hands.

Thanking you in advance for this favor and the favors that you have extended us in the past, we remain,

Yours respectfully,

ORVILLE O. JONAS, President.
H. E. RILEY, Secretary-Treasurer.

Resolution No. 1.

Whereas a Senate bill, known as S. 3463, is pending in the Senate and was introduced by Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington, for the benefit of all veterans' organizations; and

Whereas Senate bill 3463 has for its purpose the provisions "That transportation by water or railroad travel for members of organizations consisting of ex-soldiers, sailors, marines, or Nurse Corps, including immediate members if their families travel with them, to all encampments or conventions of their respective organizations, shall not be more than 1 cent per mile: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That by the convention of delegates of the Disabled Veterans of the World War in convention assembled in the city of San Diego, State of California, we indorse said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the United States Senators and Congressmen from the State of California, and that they use all their efforts to enact Senate bill 3463.

Resolution No. 2.

Whereas great delay has occurred and is occurring in getting disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines started on their course of vocational training; and

Whereas it has been found impossible for such men to accept satisfactory temporary employment while waiting action of the Vocational Training Board; and

Whereas such men are compelled to exist on small amount allowed them, or compensation, with the consequence that many disabled men are compelled to go heavily in debt to maintain themselves and families during this waiting period: Now, be it

Resolved, That steps be taken by the Veterans' Bureau to expedite payment of compensation or award of Vocational Training; and be it further

Resolved, That the Director of the Veterans' Bureau is hereby requested to take all steps necessary to see that the provisions of the rehabilitation act, as provided by Congress, be carried out to their fullest extent, and that decentralization be actually accomplished.

Resolution No. 6.

Whereas there has been great inefficiency in the administration of hospitalization in so far as pertains to the psychopathic or mental cases of disabled veterans; and

Whereas great mental suffering is caused to the veteran and his immediate relatives by virtue of being hospitalized in different State institutions known as insane asylums; and

Whereas it is the opinion of all right-thinking people that this class of disabled veterans be taken care of in a Government-controlled institution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Disabled Veterans of the World War, in convention assembled, urgently request that immediate steps be taken by the Senate and by Congress and the Veterans' Bureau to provide suitable hospitalization for the aforementioned disabled veteran; and be it further

Resolved, That such hospital be established on the Pacific coast, preferably in California, on account of the climate and environment conditions, and that it be provided at once; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Members of the United States Senate and Congress serving from the State of California and the Veterans' Bureau.

Resolution No. 8.

Whereas at the last annual convention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, held at Los Angeles, Calif., May 16 to 22, 1921, this organization went on record as favoring any measure condemning any discrimination toward disabled emergency officers, and approving any method that would place them on the same status relative to the privileges now enjoyed by other officers of the Army, marines, or the Navy; and

Whereas the Senate has passed a bill known as the Bursum bill (S. 1565), providing retirement for disabled emergency officers; and

Whereas this bill is now in the hands of the House Military Affairs Committee for their consideration and presentment to the House of Representatives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Disabled Veterans of the World War, in our second annual convention assembled in the city of San Diego, State of California, after thorough consideration, do hereby approve and urge that the above-mentioned bill be heartily and speedily acted upon by all concerned for its passage.

Resolution No. 10.

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War that the Veterans' Bureau trainees have had their compensation canceled or reduced or discontinued without adequate notice of such cancellation or discontinuance; and

Whereas the veteran so affected is unable in a great many instances to adequately care for himself or for those dependent upon him; and

Whereas such time should be allowed as is compatible with his welfare: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Disabled Veterans of the World War, in convention assembled, hereby request that an extension of time be allowed him for final rehabilitation or for a reduction in compensation or a discontinuance of training pay, and that the time so extended the above disabled ex-service man should be for a period of 90 days.

Resolution No. 11.

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the State convention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, now assembled in the city of San Diego, in the State of California, that a great hardship is being worked upon tubercular ex-service men on account of the cancellation of contract hospital in and about the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles; and

Whereas there exists at the Soldiers' Home at Sawtelle, Calif., and other Government hospitals crowded conditions that are not beneficial to tubercular ex-service men: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Disabled Veterans of the World War, in convention assembled, request that the Veterans' Bureau secure by lease or by any other method available a suitable hospital or hospitals in or near Los Angeles, Calif., and maintain same under Government control for the benefit of tubercular patients.

Resolution No. 16.

Whereas many disabled veterans of the World War are dying because their disabilities are aggravated by worry and disappointment, due to delays caused by the red tape of the Veterans' Bureau, and many wives and children are being left destitute thereby; and

Whereas Congress has appropriated funds to take care of these cases and has ordered that the Veterans' Bureau be decentralized in order that these funds may be used to the best advantage; and

Whereas the Veterans' Bureau has not been decentralized, and as a result many thousands of sick and disabled have been waiting for several years for proper action on their cases; and

Whereas most of this distress and economic waste of men and money could be avoided if the district and subdistrict office had authority to properly handle disabled persons with whom they come in actual contact; and

Whereas under the present system the district offices are unable to get action of any kind from Washington without delays of many months, because Washington is inefficient and indifferent to the urgency of these mere paper cases; and

Whereas the medical and other employees in the district and subdistrict offices are better qualified to pass judgment on the merits of persons whom they have examined and observed in the flesh than is any clerk in Washington to whom the disabled person is merely a few sheets; and

Whereas these abuses are nation-wide: Be it

Resolved by this convention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, That pressure be brought to bear on the Veterans' Bureau at Washington to actually decentralize its activities and empower its medical and other boards in the district and subdistrict offices to make final ratings on all persons coming before them, and that the Washington office not interfere with such ratings without a complete and fair examination of the person of the disabled man or woman so rated; and

Be it further resolved, That in case the Veterans' Bureau does not grant the above requests that the President and both Houses of Congress be called upon to abate the present injustices.

Resolution No. 17 of the second annual convention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, May 15 to 21, 1922.

Whereas the Bureau of War Risk Insurance of the United States Government was granted powers and moneys by Congress to carry on the business of insuring ex-service persons; and

Whereas this bureau has issued circulars and bulletins from time to time stating what they would do for such ex-service persons; and

Whereas said bureau has failed to carry out many of its promises and because of this and a general inefficiency and indifference has lost 800 per cent of the business; and

Whereas this bureau is not functioning along the lines outlined by Congress, and men have applied for reinstatement of their insurance under the regulations laid down by Congress and the bureau and have been refused such reinstatement after long delay; and

Whereas a specific case is before this convention of a man complying with all the regulations and paying over $200 for reinstatement, and at the present time, nearly two and one-half months after such application, has not received action on his case; and

Whereas such conditions would not be tolerated in any private business and are a source of much worry to the applicants because their families are not protected and the expense of the insurance goes on without the payer receiving anything in return: Be it

Resolved by this convention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War, That both Houses of Congress be petitioned for relief from such intolerable conditions.

Resolution No. 19.

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the Disabled Veterans of the World War in convention assembled at San Diego, State of California, that there is great dissatisfaction existing in the different institutions throughout the United States maintained by the Government known as the soldiers' homes; and

Whereas the veterans of the different wars of the United States now in the aforementioned homes are compelled to dine and room in the same quarters; and

Whereas this close contact of the above-mentioned veterans of our different wars has created dissension and ill feeling between them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That such war veterans be maintained or segregated in different quarters, according to the period that they have served or according to the war in which participated if so desired by them.

Resolution No. 22.

Whereas it is the opinion of the Disabled Veterans of the World War in convention assembled at San Diego, Calif., that owing to the excessive fees in most cases charged by the physicians and surgeons the disabled ex-service man can not secure adequate medical attention for members of his immediate family; and

Whereas this has in many cases brought upon the disabled veteran and his family great suffering and pain that could have been obviated had there been provisions made to care for them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Disabled Veterans of the World War go on record as favoring an amendment to the existing rehabilitation act that will provide that any member of a disabled veteran's immediate family secure whatever medical attention that is necessary for them in cases of illness.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the conference report upon the War Department appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

Amendment 225: Page 134, after line 5, insert:

MUSCLE SHOALS.

For the continuation of the work on Dam No. 2 on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Ala., to be immediately available, $7,500,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede and concur, and the gentleman from Georgia demands a division of the question. The question is on the motion to recede.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur with an amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some understanding about time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, pending the vote on the motion to concur, the gentleman from Mississippi and other gentlemen have asked for time for debate. As far as I am concerned, I am so disposed. I think the amendment of sufficient importance to be debated for the information of the House. How much time does the gentleman think necessary?

Mr. SISSON. I have been overwhelmed with requests for time. I had an informal talk with the chairman, and I suggested two hours, one hour on a side. That will not supply the demand for time on this side, but I know the value of time, and I would be very glad if we could agree on two hours. I would not want the gentleman from Kansas to lose absolute control of the bill.

And if we can agree on two hours I am willing that the gentleman from Kansas shall control the time, with the understanding that I had that he was to yield the time——

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that I have been given to understand that there is a good deal of important business to follow this conference report, particularly the grain futures bill, and I suggest that we get along with less than two hours. Would a discussion of an hour and a half satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. SISSON. Of course, the gentleman has control of the time, but this side of the House is so much interested in the matter and so many want to speak and want to discuss it——

Mr. MANN. They can not all speak, anyhow.

Mr. SISSON. I know they can not all speak, but I would like to accommodate as many of these gentlemen as I can. I will say to my friend that during the entire discussion personally I have done everything in the world I could to facilitate the passage of the bill, and I believe every man on this side of the House has. Not only that, but we have tried to keep a quorum for you, and everything of that sort.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time on this amendment may be extended to one hour and a half total, with the understanding that one-half of the time may be used by such gentlemen as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] may designate.

Mr. SISSON. May I suggest to the gentlemen on that side of the House to make it 30 minutes more? It would be very much more satisfactory to this side of the House. There are a good many angles of this matter that should be debated. We can not accommodate anything like half of the men that want time. I have told them of the importance of conserving time on account of the bill that is to follow, the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. MANN. After all, there will be more men who will listen to the debate in an hour and a half than in two hours.

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As the gentleman from Mississippi stated, it only means half an hour or more. We stayed here last night until 10 o'clock, and I am sure that on account of a subject of this sort the Members, if necessary, would be willing to stay half an hour later to-night.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the request I made by extending the time to two hours.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 225, with the following amendment:

Strike out in said amendment the words "to become immediately available" and insert in lieu thereof the following, to wit, "but not to become available until the 1st of October, 1922."

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-five Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman want to take the responsibility for delaying the construction of Muscle Shoals?

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Michigan does not want to take the responsibility for killing the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Georgia evidently sees it is not good politics.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JAMES moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 225 with the following amendment: Strike out in said amendment the words "to become immediately available," and insert in lieu thereof the following, to wit: "but not to become available until the 1st day of October, 1922."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a substitute for the amendment that I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUDDLESTON offers the following substitute for the amendment of Mr. JAMES: Strike out from said Senate amendment No. 225, in lines 8 and 9, the following: "to be immediately available"; and add, after the figures "$7,500,000," the following: "Provided, however, This appropriation shall not become available until such time as the Congress shall have taken final action on H. R. 11903, and not then if the subject matter of said bill is enacted into law in a manner as will result in the consummation of contracts for lease and sale of the Government Muscle Shoals properties to Henry Ford, and in which event said appropriation shall be available in carrying out by the Government the provisions of the contracts as to such lease and sale: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to postpone such availability later than January 1, 1923."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the substitute is not a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], and, further, that it is not in order because not germane to the Senate amendment, and, further, that it is legislation and counter to the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition presented for the attention of the House is Senate amendment No. 225, which reads as follows:

For the continuation of the work on Dam No. 2, on the Tennessee River, at Muscle Shoals, Ala., to be immediately available, $7,500,000.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will save time to hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I think I grasp the particular point that the Speaker has in his mind, in the feeling that perhaps the amendment may not be proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it seems to the Chair very clear that the provision carrying out the purposes of the Government as to contracts for lease or sale is legislation. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. On that point, Mr. Speaker, let me suggest this: For the purposes of this discussion we must assume that the James amendment is germane and proper. No point of order has been reserved against it. For the purposes of this amendment the James amendment should be treated as though it had been written in the report. We should consider the situation as though the report of conferees had been presented to the House with the James amendment incorporated in it.

That is the parliamentary situation. Now, then, the purpose of the James amendment is to postpone the availability of the appropriation to a day certain. My substitute offered for that amendment does not create new law. It merely postpones the availability of the appropriation until the happening of a contingency. If we should adopt the substitute, it will not mean that the House bill referred to will become a law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It means, however, that unless and until that bill shall become a law this appropriation shall not be available to be expended unless action by Congress should be delayed upon it until January 1.

Now, I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary effect of my substitute is to postpone the day upon which this appropriation may become available until January 1. Undoubtedly, had there been omitted in the substitute any reference to the Ford offer, it would have been entirely legitimate to have named some other or different date from that named in the James amendment, and that is the only effect, it seems to me, that my substitute has. In other words, the availability of this appropriation is postponed by my substitute until January 1, unless in the meantime the Congress has seen proper to pass certain legislation.

I believe there are a multitude of precedents for the postponement of the availability of appropriations until the happening of a certain contingency, and the fact that that contingency is the passage of a bill by Congress does not in any sense affect the principle. For illustration let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the substitute had mentioned as a contingency the washing away so much of the dam at Muscle Shoals as is already constructed that would not affect, it seems to me, the validity of the amendment. I am sure we have a multitude of precedents hinged upon such contingencies. I submit that the fact that the contingency is action by Congress does not affect the principle which may be involved in this. I do not know what else I might say on the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has not addressed himself to the point suggested by the Speaker as to the provision carrying out legislation in regard to contracts of lease or sale. The amendment makes the money available subject to the carrying out of the contracts for lease or sale.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am sorry that I did not understand the Speaker to call my attention to that before; otherwise I would not have taken up the time. Very clearly that clause is legislation. The amendment was drawn by another Member, and I did not have a chance to note the effect of that clause. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it and offer it again in changed form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman had better take his amendment and modify it as he desires.

Mr. ANTHONY rose.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to offer my amendment in amended form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUDDLESTON offers the following amended substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. JAMES: Strike out from said Senate amendment No. 225, in lines 8 and 9, the following: "To be immediately available" and add after the figures "$7,500,000" the following: "Provided, however, This appropriation shall not become available until such time as the Congress shall have taken final action on H. R. 11903, and not then if the subject matter of said bill is enacted into law in a manner as will result in the consummation of contracts for lease and sale of the Government Muscle Shoals property to Henry Ford: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to postpone such availability later than January 1, 1923."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the substitute of the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES]. I make the further point of order that it is not germane to the Senate amendment under consideration, and the further point of order that it is legislation. If the Chair has made up his mind I do not care to occupy the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The authority under which this work is proposed to be undertaken is found in the war authorizations act of June 3, 1916, which authorized the President—to construct, maintain, and operate, at or on any site or sites so designated, dams, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses—for the generation of electrical or other power and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products.

And so forth—

In that law—and I lay emphasis upon that fact—there is this provision, which has not been repealed:

The plant or plants provided for under this act shall be constructed and operated solely by the Government and not in conjunction with any other industry or enterprise carried on by private capital.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. MANN. Is there anything in the Huddleston amendment except a limitation of time as to when the appropriation shall become available?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there is.

Mr. MANN. In the amendment as now offered?

Mr. STAFFORD. As now offered; and not then unless Congress prior to that time enacts a law providing for the consummation of contracts for lease or sale of the Government Muscle Shoals properties in Alabama to Henry Ford.

Mr. MANN. That is a limitation of time within which it shall not become available.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is more than a limitation of time. It is a limitation on the authority of the President to-day to continue the work as authorized under existing law.

Mr. MANN. But it is a limitation on the appropriation, as I understand it.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the President had on hand other funds for this purpose it would not limit his use of those other funds. The Huddleston amendment would not limit the President in the use of other funds. It only limits the use of this particular appropriation.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, as I understand this pending amendment—and I ask for information—it provides that this appropriation shall not become available unless a particular House bill shall become a law. The enemies of Muscle Shoals could well afford to vote for it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois has carefully read the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will bet he has.

Mr. MANN. I read it a week ago.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand, it provides that this shall not become available if a contract is made with Henry Ford. That is the gist of it.

Mr. MANN. It is a pure limitation, that unless a certain bill of the House becomes a law the appropriation shall not be made available before next January.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not the provision. It is that the appropriation shall not be available unless a certain measure is considered and unless an agreement is reached under which a certain individual shall not be the beneficiary of the contract. Now, that is not a limitation. That provision suggests requiring the officer who would pass upon it the exercise of an opinion as to the character of the legislation, the exercise of judgment as to whether or no the legislation will accomplish certain things in a certain way. That is not a limitation. It is an attempt to make the appropriation available dependent upon certain acts and contingencies which will be difficult for anyone to determine.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Mr. Speaker, all that was put up to the House in the Senate amendment was whether we should continue that work under the authorization of law as laid down in the act of 1916. Now, an enemy of further work on the Muscle Shoals proposition is attempting to write into the law something that does not exist. The Senate has merely put before us an authorization to carry out the work under existing law. It did not submit to the House the consideration of a modification of existing authorizations. What is attempted by this amendment is to accomplish by indirection what can not be accomplished by direction. It seeks to make this fund available, not according to the terms of the original act but according to the terms of a proposed offer which is not within the provision of the original enactment. That is the offer made by Mr. Henry Ford.

Mr. MANN. No, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, if they do accept Ford's offer, this is not available.

Mr. MANN. This amendment provides, first, that the money shall not be available until H. R. 11903 has been enacted, and shall not be then available if a contract is authorized with Henry Ford, but still shall be available after the 1st of January. It contradicts itself in three or four places, but it is only a limitation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The way I construe it, the amendment attempts by indirection to override existing law, in that under existing law the President has the authority to go ahead with constructive work on the Muscle Shoals proposition. That is all that the Senate has put up to us—the fact whether the work shall go ahead under existing law.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Notwithstanding the existing law, would the gentleman contend that Congress could not put a limitation upon this appropriation that it should not be available until a certain time?

Mr. MANN. Not if it interferes with the discretion of an executive officer, and that is what this does.

Mr. WALSH. The whole question of availability is under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that this is purely a limitation on the appropriation. It does not make an appropriation available that the present law does not make available. It simply makes it contingent on a future event, and that seems to the Chair is merely a limitation. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-two Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-five Members have answered to their names.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if the House desires to conserve the interests of the Government in this very valuable water-power proposition at Muscle Shoals, I believe it should agree to the Senate amendment exactly as it is placed before the House. On the other hand, if it desires to place what in my opinion is the most valuable water-power project in the country to-day in the hands of private interests at the earliest opportunity, without having time for the proper consideration of the matter, the House should vote for amendments for delay.

Your conferees held hearings within the last 10 days in order to convince itself of the necessity for action. We came away from those hearings, I think all of us, absolutely convinced that the completion of Dam No. 2 was a necessity from every viewpoint. We came away convinced that Dam No. 2 when completed and the water power developed will be of far greater value than any estimate that has heretofore been placed upon it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will seven millions and a half complete it?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will carry on the work this year. It will take $28,000,000 to complete the dam. But when completed it will be capable of developing a greater hydroelectric power than Niagara Falls does to-day.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Last year I remember that we had this question up before us with the proposition to appropriate $10,000,000 to go on with the work. I think on our side we generally came to the conclusion that it was unwise to do it, and voted it down. Will the gentleman state what has happened since then that brings about a reversal of that policy?

Mr. ANTHONY. I know of no change or anything that has happened since that time, except from my standpoint I confess that I have been in ignorance of the real power possibilities at Muscle Shoals. When I first voted for the creation of the nitrate plant I little dreamed that so important a part of the project was this tremendous and extremely valuable water power that we now see ahead of us. We are convinced from these hearings that the financial value of Dam No. 2, the only part of the project we are considering to-day is far more than has heretofore been placed upon it, and that the Government will be derelict if it should abandon the work at this time and dispose of it at a sacrifice to private interests.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Government work in operation there at the present time, or is construction being allowed to deteriorate?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that all construction has ceased. The Government owns the construction plant at Dam No. 2 and has every facility there for a continuation of the work. We are convinced the Government can do this work of completing Dam No. 2 far more economically than any other interest can, because it has the plant already in existence; and if this amendment is passed to-day, on July 2 the Government can go immediately to work. If we do not give this authority to-day, if we adopt amendments which will delay the work of construction until October 1, as proposed, we lose an entire year in the work of finishing this dam.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And a large expense in organization. They have an organization now that could be put to work.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Did the War Department have any estimate on the cost of this dam?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has furnished us with an estimate that it will cost $28,000,000 to complete it.

Mr. KELLER. What assurance has the House that the Government is going to complete this dam? We all know of the Ohio River project, which took 25 or 30 years, and if the Government is going to use the same methods on this project it will take 25 years to complete this dam.

Mr. ANTHONY. We can only use the judgment of men whom we consider competent engineers. We have not only the judgment of the Army engineers in this case but we have the judgment of civilian engineers.

Mr. KELLER. It seems to me that we ought to appropriate enough money to complete the dam.

Mr. ANTHONY. Enough money is provided by this $7,500,000 to do all of the work that can be done with advantage this year. If the House does not act now we lose a year's time in the completion of the project and we are liable to suffer a great deal of loss through the delay of a year.

Mr. KELLER. And if the House a year from now reverses its position and does not appropriate any more money, then what?

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, in my opinion, there will be nothing lost and everything gained, because the work we propose to do increases the value of the proposition.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand the gentleman's position, he not only considers a delay of one year highly undesirable in further construction work but he feels that a delay of three months, from the 1st of July to the 1st of October, would be a very bad policy.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be bad policy, because that practically means the loss of a year.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would not a vote in accordance with the gentleman's desire against any delay in further expenditure on this dam be virtually an admission by the House that we were in error in our position a year ago when we then postponed all construction work for a year? By taking the action the gentleman suggests do we not repudiate our action of a year ago?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. I think the House exercised due caution.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not desire to yield extensively; I merely wanted to make a short statement.

Mr. ALMON. Just in respect to the cost of the dam. The gentleman will remember the hearings disclose the fact that they said $20,000,000 would build this with four units, $23,000,000 with eight units, and for the full development of 600,000 horsepower it might take $28,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SNELL. How long since any work has been done on this dam?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am unable to state that. It has been considerably over a year, in my opinion.

Mr. KNUTSON. I take it this is merely one of a series of appropriations that we will have to make? If we make this one, we will have to make others.

Mr. ANTHONY. We will have to make two more to complete that dam.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall have to decline to yield any further. Mr. Speaker, the House conferees were actuated purely with a desire to protect the interests of the Government in this very valuable property. We have acted with the desire not to interfere in the slightest with the consideration by the House of any of the propositions pending for the acquisition of this property by private parties, but we believe it is of vital necessity in order that the Government save the money it has already invested to complete Dam No. 2. Every dollar we invest toward the completion of that work makes our investment worth that much more, and it means that when we finally dispose of the property, if we do dispose of it, to private interests, the Government will receive more nearly the value of this great property. I want the House to go into the consideration of the proposition knowing that it is dealing with a hydroelectric power proposition which will in a few years be far larger than any other there is in the country to-day. In my opinion, the only danger involved in this whole question is that the Government is liable to part with its interest at a value far lower than it is really worth.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the House upon the fact that the House conferees have discussed the development of Muscle Shoals as a purely business proposition. No sectional matter, no party matter, has been mentioned. This is as it should be. This great governmental asset should be handled by Congress as business men would sit down around a table as directors and discuss a great business proposition. I sincerely trust that that attitude may be maintained at all times with reference to great Government properties.

At the outset let me say that I am unalterably opposed to Government operation of Muscle Shoals. [Applause.] The last two years convince me that if it remains under the management of the Government it will be a political football. The Government will never allow it to develop along commercial lines. I want this great plant to become, first, a blessing to the farmers, and, second, I want it to develop an electric power to be sold at low rates to cities as far as Memphis, Nashville, Birmingham, Montgomery, Jackson, and so forth. This is no dream, but with proper management can be accomplished. What marvels can be wrought within the coming years with the millions of horsepower which are possible at and near Muscle Shoals along the Tennessee River!

Let us look for a moment at Muscle Shoals. What have we there? First, the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals is said by the engineers to be as large as the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa, the Missouri at any place in Nebraska, or the Ohio at Louisville, Ky. That is to say, taken at its mean or average flow at Muscle Shoals, it will have annually as much as these other rivers at the points indicated. I mention this fact so that the people of the United States who are not familiar with the Tennessee River may have some conception of its size by comparison with these other rivers.

Second. The banks of the Tennessee at Muscle Shoals seem by nature to have been made for this express purpose. The banks at this point are more than 100 feet high. More than 100 feet head of water can be maintained by simply building a dam and a pond formed by the dam will extend about 16 miles upstream and only about 9,000 acres of land will be overflowed. This area has already been paid for by the Government and at a very reasonable price.

Third. The Wilson Dam, or what is known to the engineers as Dam No. 2, is about one-third completed and paid for. When you consider the enormous overhead charges it is more than one-half completed, for the money expended for these enormous preparations will not have to be expended again.

Fourth. Two sections of this dam, one at the north bank and one in the center, are also partially completed. The foundation for a large portion of the rest of the dam is completed and the protecting cofferdams removed. The great excavations for the power plant and south section of the dam have been made under the protection of an immense cofferdam which will permit work to be carried on in that section if the work is not delayed too long.

Fifth. A construction bridge, carrying several railroad tracks to haul supplies, rock, sand, and so forth, has been completed. Several large locomotives are also there and belong to the Government. They are sufficient to do all the local and construction hauling. There are three great mixing plants, with capacity to keep all the other equipment moving at full speed—one on the north shore, one on the south shore, and one on the island.

Sixth. A large construction town or camp has been constructed, with housing facilities for married men, bunk houses and mess halls for single men, and also administrative offices for the official corps.

Seventh. The Wilson Dam is 4,100 feet long, and is sunk into the solid rock about 15 feet below the bed of the river, and is 160 feet wide at the bottom and is 95 feet high from its bottom; 80 feet high from the original river bed to the bottom of the overflow gates and to the roadway on top of the dam 120 feet. This mighty structure when completed will be the largest single piece of monolithic concrete construction in the world. There will also be at this dam two locks for navigation purposes. Each lock will have a lift of 45 feet and will be big enough to allow the biggest river craft to pass through.

Eighth. Nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals stands to-day fully equipped, with a completed capacity for 110,000 tons of pure ammonium nitrate per annum. The site on which this, the greatest plant of its kind ever constructed in the world, stands contains 2,000 acres. This one plant, when operations were at the top notch, employed 20,000 men and was completed in one year, and in one day less than the year the first ammonium nitrate was made.

In addition to this, the steam power plant was built so that nitrate plant No. 2 could begin making nitrates for war purposes before the dam was completed, because it would have taken three years to complete the dam. This steam plant produces as much electrical energy as any other steam plant ever built. It contains one steam turbine unit with electrical generators which generate 60,000 kilowatts, or 80,000 horsepower. This is one of the largest, if not the largest, turbines ever constructed.

In addition to this, there is room for another unit, which could be made to produce 40,000 horsepower, making in all for the steam plant 120,000 horsepower. The boiler room of this enormous steam plant contains a battery of 15 boilers of 15,000 horsepower each, or 225,000 in all. If all these boilers were fired to their full capacity they would consume 1,500 tons of coal each day.

Ninth. The kiln room, where the lime rock is burned to lime, contains seven cylindrical kilns which turn slowly. They are heated by blasts from coal ground to a dust. These kilns are lined with fire brick to stand the intense heat, and are so suspended on racks or frames that they travel across the kiln slowly, and when they get across, the rock is burned to lime.

Next to this are the electrical furnaces, but in a different building. Here the lime and coke are electrically fused into carbide and this is the first process toward fixing nitrogen. There are a great many of these electrical furnaces—12 or 15, or even more. To use all the horsepower of Dam No. 2 would take 10, for it requires 10,000 horsepower for each of these furnaces. But these furnaces burn out quickly and have to be repaired, and therefore to run at full capacity all the time you must have more furnaces than you need to run at one time, for some must always be under repair. About 500 tons of carbide are produced each day.

Then next to this is the plant where nitrogen is taken from the air by the liquid-air process. This is the biggest thing of its kind on earth. Five hundred thousand cubic feet of nitrogen are made in this plant every hour and it is 99.9 per cent pure.

Next to this is what is called the oven building, which contains 1,536 ovens in which nitrogen is fixed. Each oven is 8 feet in diameter and 5 feet deep and will hold about 1,600 pounds of carbide. This carbide is heated to a white heat by an electrical process and from the building just mentioned the nitrogen is forced through this carbide and is caught or fixed as it is called. This product from these kilns is called cyanamid. The next step is to get the cyanamid in the form of ammonia gas, and later this is converted into ammonium nitrate for military or agricultural purposes.

This gives you, gentlemen of the House, some slight idea of the magnitude of this plant. There are many smaller units and buildings, each of which is necessary in this manufacture to get nitrate, but I have already gone too much into detail. I want the Members of the House to realize what is at Muscle Shoals, so that they can at once grasp the magnitude of this wonderful enterprise and how far the Government has already gone and how much money is already expended.

The condition above described was approximately the condition when the armistice was signed. If the war had continued this plant would have been completed, for the Government needed nitrates to make ammunition. But the war is over and the farmer needs nitrates for his soil to produce food for all the people. Will Congress now hesitate? Yea; will you now refuse to complete this plant, when to complete it now means life—not death? Will you spend money to kill and not spend money to save? It will take only about $21,000,000 to complete this proposed unit. We have already spent over $67,000,000 on this plant. We must not squander that. Let us appropriate this $7,500,000 now for the next current fiscal year, and the same amount for two years more will complete this, the most valuable water power in the world.

Now the question is: What will be our policy in reference to this great asset? Shall it be run and operated by the Government or shall it be leased upon terms advantageous to the Government?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this plant should be at once developed so that the Government at all times can instantly take charge of it for war purposes. The first great reason why this great property should be developed is that we may there develop the manufacture of nitrates from the air by the new cyanamid process in order to build up the soil of America, which is the foundation of a nation's greatness and the best preparation for war in time of peace.

Of course, the prime reason for originally undertaking the construction of this dam and building this plant was to get an unfailing supply of nitrates for war purposes. We have no natural supply of our own. We can not fight a war without nitrates. This was and is our only chance for a supply if cut off from Chile. What, then, is more essential to national existence in time of war than this nitrate factory? Every intelligent and informed patriot in America is for Muscle Shoals. This is no sectional question. It is essentially a national one. If this wonderful water power had been located in Ohio or any other Northern State this plant would have been completed long ago, and if any man from the South had objected he would have been called a traitor. Yes, and with good cause. So, for war purposes it is essential.

What is it to be used for in time of peace? It is very expensive to keep this plant ready for war at a moment's notice all during the years of peace. What, then, should you do to avoid this heavy burden? As I said a moment ago, in my opinion it should primarily be made a peaceful enterprise that could instantly be made a part of a war machine. This Nation should be prepared at all times to make its own nitrates. It is silly for us to be dependent upon nitrate fields five or six thousand miles from home. During the World War for three or four months, as gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations will remember, we had no nitrates, and when we sent the order down to Chile for Chilean nitrate we sent the means necessary to bring it back. Now, it was the idea of the Government when it first took over Muscle Shoals to produce nitrates to make explosives for the war. But the war closed before this plant was completed, and we have spent about $67,000,000 there. We do not want to lose all of this vast sum. But if the Government spends enough to complete this proposition we will have a vast plant lying idle in time of peace and costing millions. So the idea has now developed in the country and in Congress that in time of peace the Government ought not to operate Muscle Shoals but should have absolute control of it. Now, gentlemen, Muscle Shoals is a peculiarly well-fitted place by nature for the location of this plant. In the first place, it is the only known spot on this earth where you have an unlimited supply of lime rock and an unlimited coal supply accessible to the greatest water power in the world, all of which are essential for the manufacture by the cyanamid process of nitrogen from the air into nitrates. For this reason there is no spot on earth that can manufacture nitrates as cheaply as it can be manufactured at Muscle Shoals. Nature has located around this marvelous water power all the things necessary to make nitrates from the air. No argument can be made against it so far as its economy is concerned. And for the cheapening of fertilizers and the building up of the soil of this country no man can deny that it is a great public necessity.

You can determine the prosperity of a people without seeing them by looking at the soil. There never was a great people developed on this earth unless they were backed up by rich and productive land.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I have not the time.

Mr. LAZARO. A short question.

Mr. SISSON. I have not the time; if I had I would yield, as I never declined in my life to yield when I had time, and especially to my good friend.

Mr. Speaker, it may naturally be asked, since I have declared against the Government operating Muscle Shoals in time of peace, how I would operate it. I want to devote the few minutes that I have remaining to this question.

First, I want Muscle Shoals operated in the interest of the American farmer by manufacturing nitrates to be sold to him at practically what it costs to manufacture it. The Secretary of War has asked for proposals from individuals and corporations for the taking over by them of Muscle Shoals. No one has submitted a full and complete proposal but Henry Ford. I am strongly in favor of the Ford proposition [applause] and I will tell you why.

Mr. Ford was invited by the Engineers of the United States Army to submit an offer for the power to be developed at Muscle Shoals. Mr. Ford did thereafter on July 8, 1921, submit an offer to the proper authorities in accordance with the said invitation for proposals. The details of said offer are not material now to this discussion. Thereafter Mr. Ford was requested to submit another offer, which he did on January 10, 1922, which was a modification of his former proposal. Then again a modified proposal of January 25, 1922, each time trying to satisfy the demands of the Secretary of War. Then again Mr. Ford, on the 31st day of May, 1922, submitted another proposition which was also the same in general terms but modified to meet other objections by the Secretary of War. Now, this last proposition is the one that I favor.

This last proposition in substance is this: Mr. Ford proposes to organize and finance a corporation of $10,000,000 or more, of which at least $10,000,000 shall be in cash. The company shall complete for the United States Government, subject to the approval of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, Dam No. 2 and install all the necessary equipment for generating 600,000 horsepower. This company will lease from the United States Government all the plant at Dam No. 2 for 100 years after the completion of structures and equipment of a capacity of 100,000 horsepower, and will pay the United States Government an annual rental and 4 per cent interest on actual costs of land and flowage rights and costs of completion of locks, dam, and power house (not to include expenses incurred by Congress prior to the approval of this contract), the said rents to be as follows: $200,000 one year from the date 100,000 horsepower is developed and $200,000 per annum at the end of each year for five years. Then the company will pay $35,000 annually in quarterly installments in advance for repairs, and so forth, on Dam No. 2. The company also agrees to complete the balance of the project as soon as practicable. The company also agrees to pay to the Government $5,000,000 for the equipment and supplies on hand. In other words, Ford pays $5,000,000 for property which he buys and pays rent on property which is not sold when completed and 4 per cent on money spent in completing the plant, and at the end of 100 years the whole plant is turned back to the Government. That is to say, the Government gets its money back and 4 per cent interest on its money and in the end gets all the plant. In addition to this, Ford agrees to manufacture 110,000 tons of ammonium nitrate each year, and he agrees to sell it direct to the farmers for 8 per cent profit. I do not know how many tons of fertilizer 110,000 tons of pure ammonium nitrate would make, but I know that it would make many more tons than 110,000. Ford also agrees to keep the plant in first-class shape, and at any moment that the Government needs it for war purposes the plant will be turned over to the Government. He also agrees to sell electric power to the people and towns throughout the whole country accessible to Muscle Shoals.

So under the Ford offer the Government gets the plant for war purposes when it needs it. In time of peace the farmer gets cheap fertilizer at at least one-half of what he otherwise would pay. The people of that section get cheap power. The Government is at once relieved of not less than $500,000 annual expense of guarding and protecting the property.

If Mr. Ford's proposition is accepted, Muscle Shoals at once becomes an assured success and a blessing to the people of America. It is a beautiful dream which will become a reality. Men must first dream dreams before they can accomplish great things. The practical man is the man who can make his dream a reality. Mr. Ford can do this. The American people believe in him.

This marvelous water power now going to waste in its race to the sea is, in Ford's mind, a great instrumentality for usefulness to the people of America. Here is a force that can be converted into hundreds of thousands of controlled horsepower which can turn millions of spindles throughout the South, can light our cities and homes, can lighten the burdens of the housewife, and make prosperous millions of farmers. Why longer hesitate, gentlemen of the House? Here is a proposition from a man who is capable of making a success of this enterprise and saving to the Treasury millions of dollars. This is the only proposition that we have that is on the square.

I believe Ford has the right mental attitude toward this matter. I believe that the American people, irrespective of what political opinions they may entertain, believe that his mental attitude is right. I believe Ford has seen a real vision of usefulness in connecting his name with the development of this great property which will not only benefit the soil of America but will benefit every home, however humble; benefit every palace, however great; benefit the hungry by feeding the millions in our cities, and benefit all by making America a land in which there will be plenty in time of peace as well as plenty in time of war. I believe he has that vision, and that vision of his is shared, I believe, by every Member of this House who desires to bless humanity. If you desire to do this, gentlemen of the House, let us stop quibbling and delaying and at once become a part of this scheme which will cheapen food and food products, which will improve the soil of America, relieve people from oppression on the part of men who would oppress mankind by demanding too much for fertilizers. I believe that every man in this House who votes for the acceptance of this offer of Mr. Ford will confer a blessing upon humanity and generations yet unborn.

If you want the indorsement of every farmer in America, vote for his interest. Then, in voting for his interest you vote for the interest of all. The cities will bless you for your vote as well as the people of the country. When all the farms are fertile, prosperous, and productive the farmers and their families are well fed, well clothed, contented, and happy; and the people of the cities also being assured of an ample food supply and raw material for their industries, all find contentment, wealth, and happiness.

If America is to stand at the forefront of the nations and lead the world in usefulness, it will be because we have the greatest food-producing soil in the world. I believe that Ford's proposition will do that. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House was in session nearly 10 hours. During that time more than 7 hours were consumed in roll calls. If all of the gentlemen who responded on the first roll call had remained in their seats the House could have adjourned before 3 o'clock. The work that the House has before it to-day could all be done and adjournment had by 4 o'clock if Members will remain.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentlemen who just answered to their names——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the regular order. The gentleman must confine himself to the subject of debate.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentlemen who had answered to their names had remained here——

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am a Republican. [Applause.] In the days gone by I have flattered myself that I had a faint conception of the principles on which our great party is founded. Suffering, perhaps, under that delusion, I was led as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in 1916 to combat with all the force I had the enactment of section 124 of the national defense act, upon which this Government was embarked, in a way, into business. It was suffering from that same delusion that led me in February, 1921, to vote against the appropriation to carry on the work at Muscle Shoals as a governmental proposition.

It was out here on the front steps of the Capitol that I rejoiced to hear the President of the United States say in March, 1921, "I am in favor of more business in Government and less Government in business." [Applause.] And furthermore, after the defeat of the appropriation by the Congress in 1921 the present Secretary of War took it as a mandate, in my judgment, that the Government of the United States was not going to go on and construct the great plant down there as a governmental proposition, but was going to endeavor to get rid of it so far as the operation of it was concerned. And on that theory he asked men of this great country of ours to come in and submit propositions to him to take this plant over. A number of them came in, among them Mr. Ford, the Alabama Power Co., and several others. In compliance with and after investigating the law he came to Congress and said, "I have not the power to settle this question, and it must be settled by Congress." He submitted the proposals to the Speaker. The Speaker in turn submitted them to the Committee on Military Affairs to try to work out a policy, and we have been working on that for months. There is a bill pending now on the calendar. It may be a majority of this House will not agree with that proposition, but, for one, I say, as a Republican, believing in the ability of the Republican Party to grasp great questions and settle them, I think we have the ability to settle this one if we will only take it up. And so I am here to-day opposing any appropriation to carry on the work at Muscle Shoals or spending one extra dollar down there until the Congress of the United States grapples with this most momentous question and settles it. [Applause.]

Personally, it is immaterial to me as a citizen whether the Government goes on and undertakes to manufacture fertilizer at Muscle Shoals or not. And being a Republican as I am, and opposed to the Government going into business, and believing in the genius and initiative of the American citizen, and believing it will be a failure or a departure from the principles we have stood on from the very inception of our party, I beg you men of the Republican Party to take hold of this question and settle it in a businesslike way.

What do we ask in this amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan? All we ask is that this appropriation be held up until the 1st day of October, until this Congress, if it has the courage, will take up this question and settle it. If you want the Alabama Power Co. to have it and put in simply a power plant down there, well and good; if you want to have the Government engage in the manufacture of fertilizer, say so. If you want Mr. Ford to take it, let us determine that question. But let us determine some policy, and not appropriate $7,500,000 to be turned over to the Army engineers, who can, on the 2d day of July, obligate every dollar of it, and put men to work down there, and which would cost this Government perhaps $2,000,000 more than it will to have the work done by individual contractors on the outside. [Applause.]

I am pleading, my friends, not for Henry Ford. I do not know the gentleman, but I will say this, that he is the only man among the millionaire class of this country who has come to this Congress or submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs a proposition that is worthy of 15 minutes of consideration so far as the production of fertilizer is concerned. [Applause.] And I want to say this, that I am not bound by that. I do not agree with him. If you will read the report made you will find that he says he will not accept the proposition as I recommend it to this House. But, gentlemen, let us meet this great question and settle it once and for all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-three Members are present, not a quorum.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11128. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande between the cities of Del Rio, Tex., and Las Vacas, Mexico;

H. R. 11634. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Norman and the town and village of Halstad, in said county, in the State of Minnesota, and the county of Traill and the town of Herberg, in said county, in the State of North Dakota, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North on the boundary line between said States;

H. R. 10770. An act to legalize a bridge across the south arm of Pokegama Lake in Itasca County, State of Minnesota; and

H. R. 11362. An act declaring Tchula Lake, Holmes County, Miss., to be a nonnavigable stream.

The message also announced that the Senate had requested to return to the Senate the message of the Senate announcing the action of the Senate upon the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 831) entitled "An act to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KINKAID, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska), was granted leave of absence on account of illness.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Mr. CURRY as Speaker pro tempore to preside at the memorial exercises on the late Representative ELSTON to-morrow.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the parliamentary status, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has two hours at his disposal. It is his desire to yield some time to the other side, and therefore I yield half an hour now to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am a Democrat. [Applause.] I believe that the prime objects and purposes of the Government are to govern the citizen and protect him in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property. I am opposed to Government operation and ownership, and I am opposed to the Government engaging in business in competition with the citizen.

I shall have great pleasure in supporting the Huddleston substitute, and in the event that is voted down I shall have like pleasure in supporting the James amendment.

The matter under consideration seems to me to be a simple business proposition. In advance of the fixing or settlement of a national public policy in reference to the great properties of the Government at Muscle Shoals would it be proper for this House to vote a further appropriation for the development of Dam No. 2? Would not a wiser plan be to first agree upon a definite policy in reference to these properties and then vote appropriations to carry out such a policy?

More than a year ago there was a proposition before this House which involved an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the identical purpose for which this $7,500,000 is proposed. That ten million dollar proposition came from the Senate, just as this seven and a half million comes from the Senate. This House after a prolonged debate and a thorough consideration voted down the $10,000,000 proposition, and thus the matter stood for more than a year. All activities ceased at Muscle Shoals, and there was not a property in the United States more inactive or dead.

What occurred to breathe life into it? It is the fact that Henry Ford, of Michigan, submitted an offer for the lease and purchase of these properties; and but for that offer you would never have heard of this $7,500,000 appropriation being advocated, or before you for consideration to-day. [Applause.]

The proper development of Muscle Shoals has a fourfold purpose: First, the generation of hydroelectric power; and it is one of the most potential power sites in the United States, and second, perhaps, to none except Niagara Falls. With the completion of Dam No. 2 and the building of Dam No. 3, almost a million horsepower would be developed. Second, the operation of the great nitrate plant which has already been completed, and which, if kept in a state of readiness, would insure this country an ample supply of nitrate for the manufacture of munitions in time of emergency. Third, in peace time for the manufacture of fertilizers.

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. GERNERD. How much fertilizer can that plant produce? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. WRIGHT. That plant can produce fertilizer containing fixed nitrogen of 40,000 tons per annum. As now constructed, it has a capacity for 110,000 tons of nitrate of ammonia, which contains 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen. The nitrogen production of the plant is of an annual capacity equal to the Chilean nitrate used by the farmers of the United States, and if the nitrogenous compounds which can be annually produced at the plant were mixed into a balanced fertilizer such fertilizer would approximate 2,000,000 tons per annum. Fourth, the development of navigation on the Tennessee River, which is of great importance. There is a stretch of approximately 40 miles on the Tennessee River which is shoaly and not open to navigation, and this stretch obstructs navigation for some 400 miles along that great river, which runs through a section full of coal and iron and other mineral resources, and if these developments are made as contemplated by the Ford offer this stretch will be made navigable. The Ford proposal is the only one before Congress and the only one which has been submitted which makes possible the utilization of this great property for this fourfold purpose.

The question arises, How would an appropriation of $7,500,000 to become immediately available affect the proposed legislation looking to the acceptance of the Ford offer? The answer is a very simple one. If this appropriation is made immediately available, work on Dam No. 2 will be at once resumed by the Government engineers, and methods may be employed and an organization perfected which might be wholly out of keeping with the plans and purposes of Mr. Ford, and a very different status of the property might exist at the time the Ford offer does come up for consideration than the status existing at present. The methods and organization inaugurated and being maintained by the Government engineers might be out of harmony with the plans of Mr. Ford, and characterized by what would occur to him as elements of great extravagance, and besides, if the $7,500,000 should be expended at the time the Ford offer comes up for consideration by the Congress, it would be necessary for the offer to be materially amended and practically resubmitted, and thus result in great delay in its final consideration. Undoubtedly it would be insisted that Mr. Ford should take into account the expenditure of the $7,500,000, and reimburse the Government therefor, or at all events that such expenditure be taken into consideration. Mr. Ford might insist that the same work which cost the $7,500,000 might have been done by him for $5,000,000, or for a much less sum than the appropriation. It must be kept in mind the offer of Mr. Ford is based on the property as it now exists. He estimates that he can complete Dam No. 2 and build Dam No. 3 for some ten or twelve million dollars less than estimated by the Government engineers, and he proposes to complete Dam No. 2 and build Dam No. 3 for the Government at actual cost and pay the Government as rental for such dams 4 per cent per annum on such cost throughout lease period of 100 years, besides, in the meantime, making payments which will reimburse the Government the cost. He does not agree to pay such interest on the cost of construction done by the Army engineers. Thus it will be seen a material change in the situation might seriously embarrass and complicate the consummation of an agreement between Mr. Ford and the Government looking to the lease and sale of these properties. What assurance has this House that 4 per cent interest would ever be returned to the Government on the proposed appropriation, if expended in construction on Dam No. 2? We are in favor of the development at Muscle Shoals, and all we seek by the adoption of either of the proposed amendments is to postpone the availability of the proposed appropriation until the Congress shall have had an opportunity to give consideration to the legislation looking to the lease and sale of the properties.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the gentleman be given one minute more.

Mr. SISSON. I have not the time; otherwise I would give it to the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SEARS. I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., June 22, 1922.]

PRESIDENT HARDING TO THE PHILIPPINE PARLIAMENTARY MISSION.

The text of the President's statement to the Philippine Commission is as follows:

"I heard with deep interest and have read with full deliberation the petition which you delivered to me through Mr. Quezon a few days ago. I must express my full and grateful appreciation of your utterances of loyalty and your confidence in the American people. I hope the travels of your mission and your contacts with both officials and private life have persuaded you that the people of the United States believe in that loyalty no less than you avow it. And I trust this mutuality of confidence and esteem will abide for all time, no matter what limitations of governments are attached to our relationship. The Philippine people and those of the United States ventured together upon a great experiment in human progress. Since you yourselves, in your petition have so heartily and officially testified to its success, quite as we have been glad to believe, I am well persuaded that our intimate experience has established our cordial relations and our ties of friendship for all time to come.

"No fixed intent, no thought of conquest, no individual or governmental design to exploit, no desire to colonize, brought us together. It was the revolution of the fates, wherein our assault against oppression at our very doors carried our warfare to yours, far away, and your liberation attended.

"No American statesman had preconceived expansion to the Orient, no American industrial or commercial interests were urging the planting of the flag and our responsibility in distant lands. The fortunes of war revealed us to one another, and held us as your sponsors before the world.

PEOPLE SANCTION POLICY.

"From the day that tranquillity and stability were established in the islands the question of the future of the Philippines has been a matter of political discussion in the United States as well as in the islands, though from a different viewpoint. Here in the States the early opposition was against so-called 'militarism and imperialism.' When the issue was made paramount, the American people gave sanction to the Government policy inaugurated by President McKinley, continued by President Roosevelt, and supported by President Taft.

"The question was not brought to the front in the general elections of 1912, but the party called to power under President Wilson had adhered to its opposition to the then existing Philippine policy. In its platform it condemned our friendly experiment as 'an inexcusable blunder which has involved us in enormous expense and brought us weakness instead of strength.' I refer to the declaration in order to have you better understand the later congressional action, which resulted in the organic act of 1916, known as the Jones law.

"It was my fortune to serve as a Member of the Senate when this act was under consideration, and I recall distinctly the varying constructions of the preamble. The progress made toward self-government in that act is not to be challenged, and I think there is no American authority, in Congress or out, suggesting any backward course. The act is not under consideration. But, since you refer freely to the expressed or implied pledge in that preamble, and call to my attention the passage of a year and a quarter of this administration without a step toward the full bestowal of independence, I remind you that at the time of passage of the act the then senior Senator from Arkansas proposed an amendment which provided for immediate independence. He had been a witness to party declarations and had encountered the conflicting opinion.

FINE FRANKNESS SHOWN.

"With fine frankness this amendment provided that 'the President is hereby authorized and directed to withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty now existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippines, and he shall on behalf of the United States fully recognize the independence of the said Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof.'

"The moment was at hand for definite, decisive action, and the resulting grant of complete and unconditional independence. Manifestly, the majority in Congress did not believe in Philippine readiness, because the amendment was rejected by the responsible majority, and no steps later were taken to hasten the grant of independence until the closing days of the same administration, when it was about to lay aside its responsibility.

"Without desire to invite contention, I recall these things to your mind, because independence has played a large part in the politics of your country and ours, and in the appraisal of our relationship it is well for your people to know something of our politics, even as we ought fully to know yours.

ASPIRATIONS COMMENDED.

"I can only commend the Philippine aspirations to independence and complete self-sovereignty. None in America would wish you to be without national aspirations. You would be unfitted for the solemn duties of self-government without them. It is fair to assume that our only difference of opinion relates to the time for independence. You crave it now, and I do not believe the time has arrived for the final decision.

"Manifestly, so far as expression has been made, the majority of Philippine citizenship prefers severance and self-sovereignty. There are, however, many among you of differing opinion. There are petitions against independence. Our missions of investigation pay unstinted tribute to your progress and commend your institutions. Nothing apart from our achievement at home is more pleasing to the United States than the splendid advancement of the Philippine people. Your progress is without parallel anywhere in the world. From a people who began with little freedom and none of responsibility, in a little more than half of one generation you have progressed notably toward self-reliance and self-government. And you have done it in spite of that lack of independence concerning which you petition.

"To the United States comes both gratification for your accomplishment and justification for this government's attitude, because you have made this record under our sponsorship and in the very atmosphere of the highest freedom in the world. I know of no parallel relationship. We have given substantially everything we had to bestow and have asked only mutuality and trust in return. We have extended your control in government until little remains but the executive authority, without which we could not assume our responsibility.

DECISION WITH CONGRESS.

"It is not possible for me as Executive definitely to proclaim an American policy, for the decision must ever be that of Congress; but I would be less than candid and fair if I did not tell you we can assume no responsibility without that authority.

"No other instance of bestowing or recognizing independent government offers comparison. There is no other instance comparable to our relationship. Our interests are mutual under existing conditions. There is no complaint of abridged freedom, no suggestion of oppression, no outcry against government by force. We do not tax for our benefit. On the contrary, we aid your treasury, out of which you expend at your own free will. In 1920 we collected in internal revenues in the United States the sum of more than 3,000,000 pesos on Philippine products and turned the money into your treasury.

"We exempt your bonds from taxation in the United States and afford you a favoring market, and ask nothing in exchange. We open our markets to your products, as you open yours to us, in the mutuality of trade under one flag. We have spared you every burden of national defense and the cost of diplomatic representation throughout the world, yet you have been secure in your peace and your representations have been befittingly expressed. If we have been remiss, we do not know it. If mutuality has not been perfect, we choose to make it so.

"I note your appeal founded on changed conditions in the world. The world situation has, indeed, changed, with a higher augury of peace than we have ever known before. But we are only entering the new order. It is not yet fixed. Your international security is fixed under our present relationship, but you would be without guaranty if complete independence were proclaimed.

ADVANTAGES OF ASSOCIATION.

"It will little avail to recite what seems to us to be the obvious advantages of association with the American community. These things do not appeal to those who are bent on the independent establishment. Moreover, accord and concord are essential to the furtherance of community relationship. Frankly, I had hoped—probably I express the hope of many of our people and likely some of yours—that somehow we might develop a relationship which assured to you complete self-control in your domestic affairs, and would enable you to rejoice with us in the economic and political advantages which are the rightful possessions of a great and righteous nation.

"It would ill become me to question your belief in readiness for the full obligations you seek to assume. There is no such thought in my mind. But I am thinking of our large responsibility. Fate cast our relationship, and we assumed a responsibility not only to all the Philippine people but to all the world as well. We have a high respect for your majority, but no less obligation to your minority, and we can not be unmindful of that world responsibility wherein your fortunes are involved in ours.

"No government is or can be perfect, from the viewpoint of everyone. We know ours is not, after nearly a century and a half of experience, but it is not unseemly to assume that our experience is of great value. Long training and universal education are essential to the approach to perfection. We not only provide education, but we compel it. You have made most commendable progress in education. Perhaps the judgment of your people to-day will be confirmed by your better educated people on the morrow, but we ought to be very sure of a highly preponderant and very intelligent public sentiment before taking the step which can not be retraced.

"Your allusion to a reversal of policy on the part of the 'first of the colonial powers' rather argues for delay than commends immediate action. More than a century of a colonial relationship between Great Britain and her more notable colonies has been marked by training for government and the approach to the measure of autonomy which prevails to-day. In the main, the longer training has strengthened the cherishment of freedom under the larger relationship, and the great, free dominions seem more rejoiced in the membership of British peoples than would have been believable 50, or even 25, years ago. They reflect the colonial benefits of larger association under one flag.

"I do not invite the inference that we are working to that relationship. We should not wish it unless it were equally your desire. Whether wisely or not, our disavowal of permanent retention was made in the very beginning, and a reversal of that attitude will come, if ever, only at your request.

"The indefinite expression has ever been as to time for launching you into your own orbit in the world of nations. You have declared your own readiness. No American authority, except as responsibility was passing, ever has been sufficiently assured to give its stamp of approval.

"Mindful of your aspirations, the Wood-Forbes Mission was sent to the Philippines with instructions to investigate conditions, appraise your progress, and make report. The personnel was chosen with the view to have the appraisal made by outstanding and able men who had been familiar with your earlier stages of self-administration.

"This mission reported many manifestations of progress, many things achieved which must have strongly appealed to Philippine pride. I can assure you they enhanced the pride of America in her helpful relationship. It was the recital of a splendid showing in material, intellectual, political, and moral progress. It gave proof that no deprivation had hindered your advancement, that no essential freedom of citizenship which we claimed for ourselves was not possessed by every citizen of the islands. Only national responsibility is lacking, for which there are ample compensations.

"Frankly, then, with every mindfulness for your aspirations, with shared pride in your achievements, with gratitude for your loyalty, with reiterated assurance that we mean to hold no people under the flag who do not rejoice in that relationship, I must say to you that the time is not yet for independence. I can imagine a continued progress which will make our bonds either easy to sever or rivet them more firmly, because you will it to be so. We must await that development. The new order in the world, made secure, with conquest outlawed, and with peace made the covenant of all civilized peoples, may speed the day when you neither need us nor wish our intimate relationship.

"At this time it is not for me to suggest the day, distant or near. Meanwhile, I can only renew the proven assurances of our good intentions, our desire to be helpful without exacting from your private or public purse, or restricting, the freedom under which men and peoples aspire and achieve. No backward step is contemplated, no diminution of your domestic control is to be sought. Our relation to your domestic affairs is that of an unselfish devotion which is born of our fate in opening to you the way of liberty of which you dreamed. Our sponsorship in international affairs is reflected in the common flag which is unfurled for you as it is for us, and security is your seal of American relationship."

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when some of us were endeavoring, in February, 1921, to secure an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the continuance of the work on the Wilson Dam, there were some gentlemen who contended at that time—and I do not question their sincerity—that it would be money wasted. Some of those who took part in that argument, in the excitement of debate, announced that the effort to secure an appropriation was nothing more or less than an attempted raid on the Treasury. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] say that everyone now realizes the immense importance and the very great value of the Muscle Shoals power development. We all now agree that it ought to be developed, and that appropriations should be made to continue the work upon Dam No. 2.

In all fairness, what individual in this country has brought the doubting Thomases of more than a year ago to a realization of the great value of that power at Muscle Shoals? It was Mr. Henry Ford [applause] by the proposition he submitted to develop and to operate that power. He submitted his proposition last July on invitation of the Secretary of War. Do you not think, in all fairness, that he is entitled to have this Congress say whether or not his proposition shall be accepted? Do you not think, in all fairness, that the farmers of this country, who are unanimously in favor of the acceptance of his proposition, because they know that it means cheaper fertilizer—do you not think, in all fairness, that the laborers and the consumers of this country, who are interested in the productivity of the farms, are entitled to have this Congress pass upon the proposition as to whether or not Mr. Ford's offer shall be accepted?

That is all we who have so earnestly favored this proposition wish Congress to do, and speaking for myself I am opposed to this House taking its contemplated recess before consideration is given to this proposition. The gentleman from Kansas has said that time is needed for consideration. What more time do you want? Mr. Ford made his proposition nearly a year ago. It was transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of War in July, and since then has been under consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, which has spent months in hearings upon this and other propositions before the committee, and the reports are now before the House. Why not take it up now and consider it? We can do so in two days if the Committee on Rules will only report a rule to that effect. You gentlemen upon the Republican side will be held responsible for inaction, and in view of the already long delay you are not going to be able to satisfy the farmers, whose interests are so vitally affected and who will derive such great benefits from an acceptance of the Ford offer, by the plea that you want further time for consideration. Why not comply with their unanimous request and at least pass one way or the other upon this proposition before you take a recess?

I am in favor of the Huddleston amendment first, and if that is defeated then I am for the James amendment. They do not bind any Member of this Congress to vote for the Ford proposition, but they do give an opportunity, before this appropriation goes into effect, to have Congress say just how the power shall be operated. And, gentlemen, let me tell you something. It has already been touched upon. I am not in favor of Government operation of that dam. I do not believe the Army officers can operate it successfully or economically. I want to see a proposition, whether it be that of Henry Ford or some one else, accepted to operate that dam, provided it is safeguarded in the public interest.

I am for the Henry Ford proposition, because, as the gentleman from Illinois has said to you, it is the only proposition that the Committee on Military Affairs after months of hearing decided was worthy of consideration. It is the only one that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported to this Congress, and a majority of the members of that committee are in favor of it. But if you do not accept this proposition, gentlemen, I will tell you what you are driving to. Just as certainly as you sit in your seats to-day you are driving to Government operation of that dam, for the people will never permit it to be leased to the Alabama Power Co. or any other monopoly. They want Ford to have it, because they have confidence that he will operate it in such manner that the general public will derive some benefit from it. The author of the Senate amendment has declared that he is opposed to the proposition of Mr. Ford, and he is the author of a bill now in the Senate committee providing for Government operation. The appropriation for immediate work was intended to cut off consideration of the Ford offer, and I for one do not wish to play into the hands of those who are really opposed to this development. We ask you to adopt the Huddleston amendment. If that amendment is not adopted, then I am for the James amendment, because I want to see time given so that Congress may decide upon the plan of operation before the appropriation goes into effect.

Mr. ALMON. The operation of the nitrate plant as well as of the dam.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, yes. When I said the operation of the dam I meant to include the operation of the nitrate plant, because that is one of the chief things that makes me for that proposition. It means cheaper fertilizer for the farmer, and that is where its greatest merit lies. Adopt one of these amendments, and I believe we will get action on the Ford offer at an early date. Otherwise I fear that those who are opposed to this development may accomplish their purpose and prevent its consideration for a long time to come, if not indefinitely. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, fortunately the friends of the important matter we are now considering have not in the past and will not now divide along political lines. Recently, before the House Military Affairs Committee, the Governor of Tennessee, a distinguished Republican and former Member of this House, made an urgent and eloquent appeal for the acceptance of the Ford offer and took occasion to say to the committee that the people of that great State, irrespective of party, were united in favor of the Ford offer. The same is true of the people of Alabama and of the other States of the South, and it is most gratifying to know that in our efforts to have the Ford offer accepted we are supported by strong friends—not few, but many—from the far West, from the Middle West, from the Middle Central States, and some even from the East.

This widely scattered support emphasizes the fact that the development of hydroelectric power on the Tennessee and the proper utilization of that power, in connection with the valuable property now owned by the Government adjacent thereto, is receiving not only local but nation-wide interest. Every organization of farmers, of laborers, of business men, of scientists—and their number is legion—who have given intelligent study to the Ford offer, have expressed unqualified indorsement of it. Can the House recall any private offer for public property which has ever before awakened such wide interest and received such enthusiastic approval from those whom it is primarily designed to serve?

I refer to these matters, not for the purpose of inviting at this time a detailed discussion of the Ford offer, because I recognize that this is neither the time nor the place for such a discussion, but certainly the recital of the above facts emphasizes the correctness of the majority report of the Military Affairs Committee on the Ford offer, in which they state that it is of transcendent importance that this matter be intelligently considered and finally passed on by this Congress at an early day.

The two pending amendments—one introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], the other by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES]—seek merely to postpone for a reasonable length of time the expenditure of the seven and a half million dollar appropriation recommended by the Senate until the House can be given an opportunity of finally passing on the Ford offer, as recommended by the House Military Affairs Committee. Some policy must be adopted by the Government, not only for the completion of the dam, but also for the operation of the nitrate plant in the interest of the two great public purposes declared in the national defense act, namely, to serve the Government in time of war and our farmers in time of peace. A consideration of the Ford offer should and will lead, in my judgment, to the adoption of a definite policy, insuring the speedy and economical completion of this great undertaking and the early operation of the nitrate plant for the benefit of agriculture.

In the spring of 1921, when an appropriation was sought to further work on the dam at Muscle Shoals, the party now in power refused the appropriation on the ground that it was necessary that some definite policy be first fixed by the Government for the operation and use of this property when completed.

At that time no private offer to finish the work and to operate the plant when completed, so as to conserve the two national purposes declared by Congress in the national defense act, had been made. In response to an invitation from the Secretary of War, Mr. Ford submitted an offer about one year ago. This offer, after a long lapse of time, was transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, was referred by Congress early last winter to the Military Affairs Committee of the House; this committee, after many months of careful, patient study, has filed two majority reports, each of which points out the advantages of the Ford offer. One, signed by 11 members of the committee, recommends the acceptance of the offer with one single reservation; the other, signed by 9 members of the committee, recommends the acceptance of the offer without reservation.

The acting chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], recognizing the importance of an early and final hearing by the House on these reports, introduced a bill, the provisions of which accord with the majority report of the committee, and a rule was promptly asked for the consideration of such bill. This rule, without any reason being assigned therefor, has been withheld, and Congress now, according to an announcement by the majority leader, will soon take a six weeks' recess, without having given consideration to this important bill and without even giving assurance that it will be considered immediately on the reconvening of Congress after August 15 next.

The friends of the Ford offer feel that the acceptance of the appropriation made by the Senate and the renewal of work on the dam by the Army Engineers, as is contemplated, will furnish an excuse for the majority leader and others opposed to the Ford offer to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the same, and I charge now that this is the deliberate purpose, I believe, of the majority leader if the Senate's action is indorsed by the House. The vote on these amendments, if favorable, will at least serve notice on the majority leader and others in control of legislation that it is the desire of the House that early consideration be given to the Ford offer, as recommended by the Military Affairs Committee, and that some policy for the operation of the plant be declared by the House before any further expenditures are made on the dam at Muscle Shoals.

Those familiar with the expenditure of money by Army engineers in the past will understand that if this dam is to be completed by the Army that it will not only result in long delay but will involve an expenditure out of the Federal Treasury of many millions, in excess of the amount that a private contractor would undertake the work for. The Secretary of War as well as General Beach, the Chief of Engineers, have both admitted that the work can not be done by the Army engineers as speedily or as cheaply as it could be if let to a private contractor.

The acceptance of the Ford offer will unquestionably result in the completion of the dam or dams at least 18 months earlier than they will be completed by the Army engineers and will redound to the benefit of our farmers in providing cheaper fertilizers within 12 months from the date when the offer is accepted. There are some who undertake to question and doubt these claims but the farmers have given more than passing consideration to the Ford offer and their approval of it has been voiced only after most thorough and intelligent study. They know what it promises, and the fertilizer and power interests are likewise keenly aware of the beneficial results to the great masses of our people that will flow from its acceptance. This is reflected in the persistent and united opposition of the power and fertilizer interests to the Ford offer.

No one is more interested than I in the development of the great hydroelectric power on the Tennessee and in the proper utilization of the nitrate plants built by the Government adjacent thereto, but I recognize that the two great national purposes which Congress had in mind in the national defense act can best be served only when this valuable property is speedily developed along economical, efficient, and proper lines. The turning over of this property to the Army engineers will unquestionably result in long delay, in large added expense, and will serve to postpone indefinitely the adoption of a sane business policy, insuring the operation of the nitrate plants in the interest of agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. OLIVER. I am aware that there are some who believe that to indorse the action of the Senate in appropriating seven and a half million dollars to begin this work, under the direction of the Army engineers, will in no way retard or interfere with the early consideration of the Ford offer—and I do not question the motives of the friends of the Ford offer in the Senate, who voted for this appropriation—but with the information that many of us in the House now have it would be a base betrayal of the wishes of the great masses of the people, who have urged early consideration by Congress of the Ford offer, if we should now, without some protest, simply vote an appropriation for the Army engineers to commence work on the incompleted dam at Muscle Shoals.

A vote to postpone this expenditure of seven and a half million dollars will mean only this, that it is the earnest desire of the House that an early opportunity be given by the Rules and Steering Committees of the House for the consideration of bill H. R. 11903, introduced by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, a distinguished Republican [Mr. McKENZIE].

If this assurance were even now given by the majority leader, the two pending amendments would be at once withdrawn and no further objection made to the immediate resumption of work on the dam. If the delay results in the acceptance of the Ford offer, or even in letting the work to a private contractor under competitive bids, even though work be thus delayed until November or the spring of 1923, I venture to assert, without fear of contradiction, that the dam will be completed under such a policy at least 12 months sooner than if the work were now turned over to Army engineers—and, further, at a saving of some five to seven million dollars to the Federal Treasury.

Adopt the Senate amendment without registering your protest in some form and, whether you will it or not, the Ford offer will be pigeonholed and forever lulled to sleep by this Congress. It is our duty to protest against such a result, especially since our protest is inspired by a request that is just, fair, and reasonable, because it merely insists that assurance be given that some day in the near future the House be allowed an opportunity to express its judgment as to a policy insuring not only early completion of the work on the dam at Muscle Shoals but the early operation of the nitrate plants so as to wisely and properly conserve the two great national purposes which Congress had in mind when this work was first undertaken. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to set out a statement made by me before the Military Affairs Committee of the House on March 8, 1922, and found in volume 1 of the printed hearings on page 994, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, March 8, 1922.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM B. OLIVER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, the Alabama delegation has received a letter from Hon. B. M. Allen, of Birmingham, Ala., who presided at a large mass meeting in Montgomery on Wednesday last, at which certain resolutions were adopted, and he has requested that the resolutions be read to the committee, and I desire to now read them. They are very complete and informing and set forth in a forceful, proper, and accurate way the attitude of the people of Alabama on the subject to which the resolutions relate.

MEMORIAL TO THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS, ADOPTED BY THE STATE-WIDE MASS MEETING HELD IN THE CITY AUDITORIUM AT MONTGOMERY ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1922.

We, citizens of Alabama, 5,000 strong, representing county governments, municipal authorities, women's clubs, labor bodies, chambers of commerce, civic bodies, and farmers' organizations from every quarter of the State, in mass meeting assembled at Montgomery, with full confidence in both the justice and wisdom of the President and Congress, to hereby declare:

That while the entire Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River lies within the borders of this State, the right to control and regulate the river in the interest of the Nation's commerce has been ceded by the State of Alabama to the Federal Government. We recognize the fact that Muscle Shoals is the property of the Nation, belonging alike to the people of all of the States, and, while we claim no greater right than any other State to say what shall be done with Muscle Shoals, we believe that we but exercise the guaranties of the Federal Constitution when we petition Congress that this great national asset be not employed by the Government as an instrumentality for fastening upon us and upon our children and our children's children the yoke of an oppressive and burdensome monopoly.

We affirm that the Alabama Power Co. now owns and controls a number of splendid power sites on the Coosa River in this State; that it owns and controls all of the available power sites on Little River in Alabama; and that it owns the wonderful power site at Cherokee Bluffs, on the Tallapoosa River in this State; that in the 14 years since its incorporation it has built one power dam in this State and commenced work on one other dam; that at the present rate of development of the power potentialities already under the control of this corporation more than 100 years will go by before all of these dormant water powers are harnessed; that it has been the policy of that corporation to develop only such power as can be sold in small units and at high prices; that controlling as it does all of the great water-power sites in a State blessed by God Almighty with wonderful power possibilities, it, a foreign-controlled corporation, is in position to litigate with any American-owned organization which may seek to develop any one of Alabama's wasting water powers, just as it now threatens to litigate with Henry Ford, or with the Government, if either seeks to build Dam No. 3 at Muscle Shoals, or to control the Government-built steam plant and transmission line at Gorgas; that in spite of the fact that this foreign-owned corporation has long enjoyed exemption from taxation in this State, it has been busy ever since its entrance into Alabama in preempting every great power site within our borders, and in so copper riveting its hold on all of Alabama's great hydroelectric potentialities as to prevent for all time their development by any possible competitor; that it has been its policy to buy these power sites at farm-land prices and to hold them in perpetuity as power sites; that it already controls the utilities in our principal cities and is year by year securing the control of the utilities in our towns and villages; and that if it secures Muscle Shoals it will have perfected its control of all of our great water powers and will hold in its selfish grasp all of these instrumentalities, placed within our borders by a beneficient providence for the promotion of the commercial and industrial welfare of all the people.

We hold that it would be a travesty on legislation if, after many years of congressional consideration of how best to conserve the power in our navigable streams for the benefit of all the people and how most surely to preserve them from being used as instruments of monopoly, the Nation's greatest water power should be handed over to the Alabama Power Co. under the national water power act; and we

Further hold that it would be the quintessence of legislative folly for the Government, after 10 years of investigation as to how best to free the United States from its dependence upon a foreign power for its supply of nitrogen for explosives in the event of war, and after spending millions of dollars in the construction of the greatest nitrogen-fixation plant in the world, to turn over the only power capable of successfully operating the nitrate plant to a corporation owned and controlled by foreigners.

We remind Congress that just as the Alabama Power Co. has returned evil for good to the people of Alabama, so it is the one corporation whose dealings with our country in the grim emergency of war was so shameless, selfish, and conscienceless that when its conduct was investigated by a select committee of Congress the minority members of this committee joined with the majority in denouncing its brazen and sordid betrayal of its duty to a war-beset nation.

Again affirming our utmost confidence in the ability and the desire of the President and the Congress of the United States and the committees of Congress to reach the soundest solution of the pending questions relating to the disposition of Muscle Shoals, we wish to express ourselves with regard to Mr. Henry Ford's proffered contract with the Government. The subject is of such vital interest to the people of Alabama that with greatest enthusiasm they have assembled in this meeting for the purpose of making this memorial:

Upon mature deliberation, we, as citizens, do express our firm conviction that it is to the best interest of the United States and to the interest of the people of Alabama that the offer of Henry Ford be accepted and concluded as a binding contract, and for the following among other reasons:

The acceptance of the Ford offer would insure the operation in Alabama of at least two great organizations engaged in the development and sale of hydroelectric energy, and would further insure competition in the distribution and sale of power throughout the territory which can be reached by transmission lines from the several power sites on the Tennessee River whose development is within the contemplation of the Ford offer.

The Ford offer insures the operation of United States nitrate plant No. 2 for a period of 100 years for the production of fertilizers in time of peace and for the production of nitrates for explosives in the event of war.

It insures to the millions of farmers throughout the United States, whose organizations have with unanimity indorsed the offer of Henry Ford, the continuous operation of this Government-built plant for the production of nitrate fertilizers in competition with the present producers of nitrates, by a company whose profits will be limited to 8 per cent, and in sufficient volume to have a controlling influence in fixing the price of nitrates and nitrate fertilizers for agricultural uses.

The Ford offer insures to the people of the United States the operation of nitrate plant No. 2 and its maintenance in such a constant state of readiness, with a trained force of operatives, as to guarantee to the Government and its citizens an independent, internal supply of nitrates, in exact accord with the announced intention of Congress as expressed in section 124 of the national defense act of 1916.

The Ford offer guarantees the construction of Dam No. 3, and makes provision for use by the people of the United States for purposes of navigation of one of the country's largest and most important rivers which is an integral part of the great Mississippi River waterway system.

In the consideration given to the various offers for Muscle Shoals much has been said about the profit and loss that would accrue to the Government of the United States and to its people from the acceptance or the rejection of the various offers. We respectfully urge that a plan which looks to a constant supply of cheap fertilizers for the farmers of the Nation through a period of 100 years, which insures to American industry during that period the use of nearly 1,000,000 horsepower of electric energy, which provides for the security of the Nation in the event of war, and which guarantees the navigability of one of the country's greatest rivers for all time—these continuing additions to the resources of the Nation, if it were possible to express them in terms of dollars, with interest at 4 per cent, will in the course of 100 years add so vastly to the wealth of the Nation and the prosperity of its people that any difference in the price of the nitrate plant as fixed in the several offers, and any difference between the purchase price offered and the estimated possible scrap value of the property, is dwarfed into insignificance.

With these considerations in view and having in mind the freedom of our own people from a galling and oppressive water-power monopoly, the freedom of the American farmer from a burdensome and grinding fertilizer monopoly, the opening of a great river to navigation, and the security of the country in the event of war, we urge the President and the Congress of the United States to accept the offer of Henry Ford, whom we verily believe seeks through his offer to dedicate to the American people and especially to the farmers of America his genius and his fortune.

We indorse the sentiment "America first" and Muscle Shoals first for Americans, and above all, for American farmers. Henry Ford is a typical American, who by his genius has done more for country people and country life than any other man of his time. A man who has the trust and confidence of the great masses of the common people, as evidenced by the resolutions adopted by every gathering of plain, ordinary Americans, including the representatives of 4,000,000 farmers, who have given voice to their sentiments in regard to his proposal for the development of Muscle Shoals.

We believe the issue in Congress is clearly drawn. It is a contest between the people and the interests which control the people's fertilizer and power resources.

On behalf of the army of the unemployed, in the interest of the great body of plain American citizens, in the name of millions of perplexed and burdened farmers, we beg our President and the Congress of the United States and its committees to promptly accept the offer of Henry Ford.

J. L. ANDREWS. EDW. A. O'NEAL.
FRANCIS PATTERSON WALKER. S. P. MCDONALD.
J. J. BUFFINGTON. CHAS. L. HAROLD.
H. C. RANKIN. EDWARD DOTY.

This resolution was unanimously adopted.

B. M. ALLEN, Chairman.
C. E. JOHNSON, Secretary.

MARCH 1, 1922.

Gentlemen of the committee, this resolution, I feel, represents the overwhelming sentiment of the people of Alabama. The statement to-day by Governor Taylor before this committee is evidence that it represents the sentiment of the people of Tennessee. The unanimous indorsement of the Ford offer by our colleagues from the sister States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, the Carolinas, Florida, Arkansas, and Texas show that it represents the sentiment of these States. Allusion has been made to its strong indorsement by every farm organization in the country—South, East, West, and North. You also have before you a most informing statement by the vice president of the Mississippi Water Valley Association, in which, without reservation, he states that it represents the sentiment of the many States included in that great organization.

It is interesting, when we come to consider the proposal before you, to note that this was a project which Congress determined on prior to the war, to be primarily devoted to the Nation's use in war and to the farmer's use in peace; and it is not surprising that the farmers, for whom it was built and constructed to serve in peace time, should now manifest great interest in the offer of one who, being possessed of financial ability and enjoying their confidence, is willing to develop it along the very lines that Congress declared should be its mission in peace.

The President, in recognition of the importance of agriculture, must have had this as well as other projects in mind in that remarkable address which he delivered on January 23 to the gathering of farmers in the city of Washington, and I beg to invite your attention to some striking excerpts from that address showing the present condition of agriculture and the importance, as recognized by the President, of taking definite action along constructive lines at this time:

"If agriculture is to hold its high place, there must be the most liberal policy in extending its opportunity.

"There must be a new conception of the farmer's place in our social and economic scheme.

"I choose to call the vocation of the farmer the most useful, and it ought to be made one of the most attractive, among all lines of human effort.

"Concerning the grim reality of the present crisis in agriculture, there can be no differences of opinion among informed people.

"You men are thoroughly familiar with the distressing details of present conditions in the agricultural community. The whole country has an acute concern with the conditions and the problems which you are met to consider. It is a truly national interest and not entitled to be regarded as primarily the concern of either a class or a section.

"There is every reason for us to consider those permanent modifications of policy which may make relief permanent, may secure agriculture, so far as possible, against the danger that such conditions will arise again and place it as an industry in the firmest and most assured position for the future.

"Up to this time railroad construction, financing, and operation have been unscientific and devoid of proper consideration for the wider concerns of the community. To say this is simply to admit a fact which applies to practically every railroad system in the world. It is equally applicable to the railways of continental Europe, in whose development considerations of political and military availability have too far overweighed economic usefulness. In America we have too long neglected our waterways. We need a practical development of water resources for both transportation and power. Waterway improvement represents not only the possibility of expanding our transportation system but also of producing hydroelectric power for its operation and for the activities of widely diffused industry."

This was a pleasing statement of what Congress in 1916 had the vision to see, and to seek, by the national defense act, to make some helpful provision for.

Is it surprising, then, when the war was over and the proclamation of peace issued, that the farmers should take account of the fact that here at Muscle Shoals is a plant, built with Government money, pursuant to the directions of Congress, as contained in the 1916 act, now practically complete and ready to serve the purpose which Congress intended. It has its power plant at Gorgas, on the Warrior, its transmission line from there to the nitrate plant, all built with Government money. There is now needed only an expenditure of some ten or twelve million dollars which Mr. Ford offers to supply to put nitrate plant No. 2 in condition where it will be prepared, from current supplied by the Gorgas steam plant, to begin the manufacture of fertilizers for the farmers. The farmers look upon it as their property, because Congress dedicated it to their use in the national defense act of 1916, and it is not surprising that they have begun to make an appraisal and survey of its possibilities.

Congress, at its last session, thought it would be unwise for the Government, without a definite policy of operation being first determined on, to expend further money in the completion of the power dams. Since that time there has come an offer, and it stood as the only offer for more than six or seven months, being discussed pro and con in all sections of the country. It was that offer, thus considered, thus dissected, that received the hearty approval of the farmers of the Nation, and of every business interest, except those in some way linked up with power or fertilizer companies, or like projects. So I think the offer is now presented to the committee in an unusually strong way, and that the farmers are asking for nothing more than present assistance from Congress to make a working concern of that plant, which was built with Government funds, pursuant to the direction of Congress, to aid agriculture in peace.

I had not intended consuming so much of the committee's time, and, in conclusion, permit me to say that I know the committee will agree with me that this is a matter of great importance to the Nation. In fact, I question whether any matter presented to Congress since the war measures up to it in importance from the farmers' standpoint. Fortunately it is a question which in no sense concerns alone any particular section. It has never at any time been considered as partisan, and I know that in searching for the rightful solution of the problems presented and in providing for the future operation of the nitrate plant so as to wisely conserve the two great national purposes declared by Congress in the 1916 defense act, this committee will declare for and recommend to Congress the adoption of a policy that will insure the use of this valuable property, so that it will at an early day beneficially serve our farmers to whose interest it was primarily dedicated in times of peace.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members present, a quorum.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] four minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Government of the United States has appropriated and spent on this great Muscle Shoals proposition more than $100,000,000. The great nitrate plant cost approximately $85,000,000, and there has already been expended on the Wilson Dam the sum of $17,000,000. The origin of these expenditures was the deliberate act of the Congress of the United States based primarily upon two considerations: One from the standpoint of national defense, and the other from the standpoint of undertaking to supply the farmers of America with a cheap commercial fertilizer for renewing the soil fertility of our country.

The Secretary of War under this administration has urged the Congress of the United States after careful consideration to arrive at some definite policy for the disposition of this great plant. Offers have been submitted to the Congress of the United States, and it is a very remarkable thing that only one offer has been made by all able to make an offer that involves the manufacture of fertilizer for and on behalf of the farmers of the country, and that is the offer of Henry Ford. If we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], which I favor, it would necessarily involve some delay, but, gentlemen, I submit that we are justified in undertaking that delay because we believe that if it is put into execution it will force—if I may be permitted to use that word—the Congress of the United States, urged by public opinion of the people of this country, to determine some definite policy with reference to the way in which the plant shall be used and for whose benefit.

There is no man in Congress who has a stronger local interest in this matter than myself. The Waco quarry, the transmission line, the Gorgas steam plant are located in my district. There are hundreds of men out of employment in my district who would like to secure employment immediately. I recognize that in taking this position I am subjecting myself, possibly, to some local criticism in my district; but, gentlemen, I am for this as a national proposition, for the benefit of America as I see it, and I am willing to jeopardize my political interests in my own district in order to carry out the great purpose of the Congress of the United States [applause] and put into definite execution a definite policy guaranteed by a man able to carry it out, not only in the maintenance of a nitrate plant for national defense, but who will give the farmers of America $250,000,000 worth of fertilizer that they annually consume at half the price they have been paying for it. The American people have confidence in Henry Ford. I have confidence in him. I believe he will make good and that the guaranty of the faithful execution of his offer will be carried out. We can well afford the delay of three or four or six months at the longest in order to give the Congress of the United States and the Representatives of the millions of people who are so tremendously and earnestly interested in this problem an opportunity to declare a definite and final action upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, down on the Tennessee River there has been expended by the United States in the development of power and in the improvement of navigation on the dam now under construction seventeen and a half million dollars. When that dam is completed it will have cost the Government altogether about $42,000,000, or $25,000,000 in addition to what has already been spent. It will develop 100,000 primary horsepower and 600,000 secondary horsepower.

The question under consideration is, then, Shall we go on and complete that dam? If so, what happens? We develop an enormous water power for the benefit of the whole country, and it will be developed at such a cost that it will pay a handsome return on the investment from the time it is completed, and until the day it is completed the seventeen and a half million dollars so far expended have been of no value whatever.

Let us take the situation as it is. It is a narrow one; it is not the question that has been discussed in the debate so far—whether we shall have Government operation or private operation, or whether we shall accept the offer of Henry Ford or consider other offers. That is not involved. Suppose we were building a 50-story structure. We now have it completed for 17½ stories. It is open to the weather; it is certain to deteriorate rapidly if left in that condition; we have $17,500,000 involved; and with all of our artisans upon the work, or where their services are required, with the work ready to go forward to completion, with the certainty that the moment the structure is completed it will rent at a fair return on the complete investment, a man comes by and says, "I will give you so much for your structure." Are you going to wait and leave it open to the elements for months and perhaps more than months—for a period of years—without doing one thing to render it a paying investment instead of a loss?

Not only is that the situation but it is worse than that, because you have, beside that, navigation; you have, in addition to that, this enormous expenditure in these two fertilizer plants of upward of $80,000,000. Are you going to abandon the whole thing? You gentlemen of the South are happy in this respect. You had the Congress of the United States in grave doubt as to the entire proposition and you have converted them to this extent, that now they believe that in some way the power should be developed, navigation improved, and the two great plants utilized. Do you want to halt progress until you decide who shall handle the spade, who shall turn each blasting of rock, who shall handle the excavation? Do you want it delayed pending that? Have not you done well when you have converted people, as they are converted here to-day, to the belief that this undertaking should be pushed forward to early completion? Is not that great progress? Do you want to be in the position of saying that you want delay until you find out just how it shall be done and just who shall do it? I quite agree with you in this respect: That ordinarily I favor private operation and not Government operation. I quite agree with you that that is the end to be sought, but you are not going to have that matter before you for many months yet to come. You do not know when you can consider it. Do you want to halt entirely during that time? Are you certain as to what is going to happen meantime? Are you so sure of public sentiment, are you so sure of the sentiment of the House, are you so sure that sentiment never changes? To-day you will add to your $17,500,000 of money already spent seven and one-half million dollars, making it $25,000,000, and you will have done more than one-half of the total work of construction on this dam. Each additional dollar spent makes it more certain that this great public improvement will be completed. It is not of great moment who develops the power, who improves the navigation, who makes it possible to operate the plants, so long as the work is done economically and promptly. What is important is that there be no delay in completing the work. Congress will no doubt decide the questions of policy before another appropriation is made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, for eight years I have worked hard and consistently for the development of the Muscle Shoals proposition on the Tennessee River. During that time I have seen most of the Members of this House shift from one side to the other. To-day the Democratic side of the House has shifted from where it stood one year ago. I fought with you one year ago for the development of the Muscle Shoals proposition. To-day we have won our point. We have the appropriation within our reach, and, lo and behold, the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House turn around and want to hamstring it. They want to put a limitation on the appropriation for the development of the Muscle Shoals. Was ever anything so absurd? They talk about accepting Henry Ford's proposition. There is not a word in this appropriation or in the limitations deciding that matter at all. I have fought in the Committee on Military Affairs for six months in favor of the acceptance of the Henry Ford offer. I stand to-day just as I have stood before. I want the Muscle Shoals development carried forward. It is the second greatest national enterprise the country has. The Panama Canal is the first one. Properly developed and conserved, it is possible to make Muscle Shoals the greatest national asset this Government has for national preparedness and the conservation of the soil for future food production. You now have the appropriation, but you want to tie it up with a limitation that means nothing except this. It means that that work is to be delayed for one year. I challenge any gentleman to deny that. Take three months or six months out of that development from the 1st of July and the proposition means that you delay the development one year. That is all you are doing if you adopt either the James amendment or the Huddleston substitute.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman has asked for a rule—or, rather, the chairman of the committee has—and if that rule were granted this matter could be taken up and disposed of in two days.

Mr. HULL. Yes; but that is in the House only; and I face the parliamentary situation, and I understand it, in the Senate. The Democratic side of the House does not seem to understand the parliamentary situation. There is not any possibility of passing the Henry Ford proposition through both Houses and having it signed by the President in three or in six months.

Mr. SEARS. Why not? You have the majority.

Mr. HULL. Oh, I have not time to discuss that point; but study the matter and you will agree that I am right. Gentlemen, you have to-day in this appropriation the possibility of going forward and completing the Muscle Shoals proposition—now, to-day, not in six months—and I appeal to the House, and I say, "Let's go." [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to state that I am a Republican because of the fact that I am one of the two Republican members of the Committee on Military Affairs that signed—I was about to say the minority views, but I will amend that and say the plurality report. I refer to the report that was signed by eight members of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am a Republican and I favor the Henry Ford proposal. I do not know anything in Republican policies or principles that is inconsistent with the views that I take on this proposition. I could not, nor could any man, in ten times five minutes allotted to me, discuss the Ford proposal. That is not the issue before this House at this time. The question is not raised by either the Huddleston amendment or the James amendment of whether this House ought to accept the Ford proposal. The issue involved at this time and presented to the House is whether we ought to give the Ford proposal a fair consideration at some time. It is impossible to do it to-day, and the Huddleston and James amendments mean only that at some time later, under the Huddleston amendment before January 1 and under the James amendment before October 1, this House of Representatives shall have a fair discussion and consideration of the Ford proposal. That is the only issue involved, and I submit in view of the fact that this is the biggest question, according to the statement made not only in the majority report but also in the minority report, that confronts the American people to-day, that kind consideration should be given to it. The farmers of the country and the laboring men of the country, the people generally, are expecting us to give fair consideration to it. What does the majority report of the Committee on Military Affairs say on the importance of the proposition? It reads as follows:

> The committee was further impressed with the fact that the subject is one of such transcendant importance that the whole membership of the House should have an opportunity of passing on the proposition.

The report signed by five of the members of the Military Committee also states its importance at the very beginning of the report, as follows:

> What shall be done with Muscle Shoals is one of the big questions that is confronting Congress.

I do not know the purpose of the Senate amendment. It is not necessary to discuss that, but we know, or we believe we know, what the effect of it will be, namely, to prevent a fair discussion of the main question of whether the Ford proposal should be accepted. If I am mistaken in saying that that will be the effect of the Senate amendment if adopted, then you can not object to voting for either the Huddleston or the James amendment.

It is a plain proposition. I want to call attention further to the fact that 11 members of the committee——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Can the gentleman give me two minutes more? I just want to develop one feature.

Mr. SISSON. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. WURZBACH. I just want to call attention to the fact that eight members of the Military Affairs Committee, six Democrats and two Republicans, favored the Ford proposal. Three other members of that committee favored the Ford proposal with a slight objection, namely, they favored the exclusion of the Gorgas plant, but outside of that they also favored the whole acceptance of the Ford proposition. Therefore, you have 11 members of the Committee on Military Affairs, a majority thereof, who certainly favored the full and fair consideration of the Ford proposal by this House, because they actually favored the acceptance of the proposition, and, as I stated, three of them objected only to the inclusion of the Gorgas plant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want any friend of the Ford offer to believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] or the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] means a delay. I am in favor of the Huddleston amendment. No man on the floor of this House would doubt for one minute my sincerity in the development of that great project at Muscle Shoals. This Senate amendment is a scheme, my friends, of putting across $7,500.000 which this House, through the votes of Congressmen opposed to any kind of development of Muscle Shoals, turned down a year ago, for the purpose of drawing a red herring across the track and fooling the people.

The people who are in favor of Henry Ford getting this property as we, the Military Affairs Committee, have brought it here, including the Gorgas steam plant and the transmission lines, would be wise to support the Huddleston amendment. For my part, I will vote against the $7,500,000 if you kill the Huddleston and the James amendments. We must have one of them. [Applause.] Because I realize without one of those amendments—the Senate amendment offered and sponsored by enemies to the Ford proposal—it is for the special purpose of fooling the folks, and, secondly, not give that great benefit to the Nation that the Henry Ford offer proposes to do. All of the influence of Wall Street is against the Ford offer, and they hope to prevent action on the Ford offer after they get this subterfuge $7,500,000 through to begin work on the dam. I appeal to you for the humble hearthstones of the Nation; I appeal to you for the farmer with his little house on the hillside and for the farmer in the valley; I appeal to you for the farmer on the plantation; I appeal to you for the laboring people in the United States, for the people who work and toil for a living everywhere, to support the Huddleston amendment; for, in my judgment, the enemies who are endeavoring to defeat that are endeavoring to choke off the Ford proposition. Let us put the limitation on the $7,500,000, so that farmers and laboring people and the plain people in every State will keep the fires burning and force the Republican steering committee and Rules Committee to bring the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals on the floor of this House and give the Congressmen of the people a chance to vote on it. All of us friends of the farmer and laboring people will be here to take care of the Ford offer for the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant if you will give us a chance for a vote on the straight proposition just like Ford has agreed to before the House Military Committee. Do not doubt that. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, when the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth they found a virgin country, seemingly boundless in its variety of natural resources, of which there seemed to be an inexhaustible supply. As the years went by and industries were gradually built up the American people continued to use only the best of these resources, for there seemed to be enough and to spare. And now, after these several centuries of profligate waste, we are coming to realize that the resources of this country are not inexhaustible. Already it is predicted that the coming generation will see the end of our supply of commercial timber. Our oil is fast disappearing. We have been shipping abroad the cream of our most available phosphate rock. It is the iron ore of very best quality that is the most depleted and the most desirable grades of coal, most economically mineable, that are being consumed most rapidly. It is a notorious fact that no European nation could adopt American policies in the use of their raw materials and long survive. Among our more valuable resources there are two which can be truly said to be inexhaustible. One of these is water power, which is wasted only when it is not utilized; the other is the nitrogen of the atmosphere, of which the supply is great almost beyond our comprehension.

Realizing this state of affairs, a few years ago the National Conservation Congress was called together at Washington. The congress declared that the American people were squandering their patrimony, not only in these materials for industry but in that greatest of resources—the fertility of the soil. One has only to review the history of the nations which are dead and gone to appreciate the truth so well stated by Theodore Roosevelt in the Outlook of October, 1912, where he said:

> I have always been deeply impressed with Liebig's statement that it was the decrease of soil fertility and not either peace or war which was fundamental in bringing about the decadence of nations. While unquestionably nations have been destroyed by other causes, I have become convinced that it was the destruction of the soil itself which was perhaps the most fatal of all causes.

The history of agriculture in the United States reflects but little credit on the foresight of the American people. We are a nation of soil skimmers. We do not maintain the fertility of our soils, but we deliberately remove it, and when the fertility is gone the practice has been to find a new farm elsewhere and start the mining process over again.

The big volumes of the Bureau of the United States Census are not particularly interesting reading, but to anyone who will study them they show conclusively the direction in which this Nation is rapidly going. The peak of agricultural production per capita in this country was passed in 1898, and it is predicted that we will be a food-importing nation within another generation. Our supply of virgin land has been taken up. The only source to which we can look for increased acreage is the small amount that can be reclaimed by irrigation or drainage, and this small amount is offset many times over by the abandonment of improved farm lands in the Eastern States. For the last 40 years the record shows that while the population of the New England States, including New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, has increased by 15,000,000 people, or 103 per cent, the number of farms has decreased on an average of 2,880 every year and the acreage abandoned averaged nearly 350,000 acres annually, totaling in the 40 years nearly 14,000,000 acres in these nine States, while the total lands placed under irrigation by the Reclamation Service to and including 1921 amount to 1,675,000 acres.

It must be remembered that as far as location is concerned these are the best-located lands in the United States for agricultural purposes. They are the closest to the markets, their freight rates are the least to the great consuming centers of population, and they have had the benefit of the development of agricultural science in the oldest of the American States.

I am not one of those who believe in a medicine that will cure all ills; I do not believe that it was wholly the lack of fertilizer that caused the intelligent farmer to leave his country home in the East and go elsewhere; but it seems evident to me that, if the eastern farmer had been offered a return for labor that compared favorably with the rewards of labor in other farming sections and in the cities, eastern agriculture would not have suffered the decline that it has, and in such an enterprising State as New Hampshire, for instance, 70 per cent of the cultivated acreage would not have been deserted.

Another section of our country in which agriculture has been carried on for many years is the South, and it is a well-known fact that in the South the very existence of the farmer depends upon his ability to secure the necessary fertilizer. I know that personally. I was raised on the farm, and have gone over every Southern State in looking into farm conditions.

Assyria was once a great empire; so were Babylon and Persia; but to-day the lands that were formerly fertile are a desert waste and support but a small fraction of the population that once depended upon them. We of America know little about famine, but the populous countries of the East, where the fertility of the soil is practically exhausted—such great countries as India and China—know what famine is, and it requires but the failure of a single crop to cause these countries to become supplicants for the charity of civilization.

There are some 14 elements which are required to sustain plant life. In general, all of these are available in great abundance in cultivated soils, with three exceptions—nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and potash. It is six years since the National Conservation Congress held its meeting in Washngton, but the statement is as true to-day as it was then, when the water power-nitrate-phosphate-potash committee reported that—

> On the wise development and disposition of these resources depend the Nation's security and defense, the adequate production of food, the cost of living, the efficiency, facility, and comfort of our transportation, our industrial supremacy, our civic welfare, and many other industrial and social advantages and necessities. We believe that all of these factors taken together comprise the major part of the elements that constitute national welfare.
> The great necessity for industrial preparedness causes us to emphasize the importance of immediate water-power development on a grand scale as a means of obtaining nitrogen from the atmosphere and phosphorous from low-grade phosphorous rock, and also as a means of cheap reduction from ores and the breaking up of insoluble compounds found in nature. The hydroelectric current is possibly the key that will unlock the doors of the heretofore impenetrable storehouse of potash contained in our feldspars, serecites, mica schists, and other like minerals, and in addition may even liberate valuable by-products from these rocks. (Proceedings of the National Conservation Congress, pt. 2, p. 26.)

We claim no miracles for Muscle Shoals. We do not claim that the operation of the nitrate plant, as proposed by Mr. Ford, will suddenly make fertile these millions of abandoned acres and restore overnight the productive capacity of this country so that we may secure the yields per acre of former days, but we do maintain that the time has come to recognize the national importance of fertilizer in the United States.

I know if we get Ford to operating that nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, the farmer will get fertilizer at half the price he is paying to-day. It is bound to help the farmers.

It has been testified in the voluminous hearings that have been held on this subject that the fertilizer industry is a scavenger industry, utilizing the waste products of the slaughterhouse and the garbage-disposal plant as a source of nitrogen and combining them with phosphoric acid obtained by a most wasteful process and with potash imported from abroad. Without seeking to belittle the value of this fertilizer industry to the country in the past, the evidence shows beyond all reasonable doubt that this industry conducted along present lines is not meeting the present needs of agriculture and can not be expected to do so in the future.

It is not that there is a scarcity of fertilizer material. The inexhaustible atmosphere can furnish the nitrogen, and there is a phosphate supply for centuries to come in our deposits of phosphate rock. We also have the potash in abundance, although it is not in readily available form. The difficulty is not in lack of supply but in lack of supply at a sufficiently low price. A well-informed witness has pointed out that in 1909 the corn, wheat, and oats, in grain alone, removed from the soil of the United States 3,915,000,000 pounds of nitrogen, 606,000,000 pounds of phosphorus, and 875,000,000 pounds of potash. To replace this nitrogen in the soil would have required 9,912,500 tons of ammonium sulphate a year. (Mr. Bower, House hearings, p. 618.) As a matter of fact, in 1909 the total consumption of ammonium sulphate was 146,642 tons (the American Fertilizer Handbook, 1919, p. 653), and the total nitrogen fertilizer used 10 years later, in 1919, was the equivalent of 883,980 tons of ammonium sulphate.

If American agriculture is to maintain the fertility of our soils there must be a very large increase in the use of fertilizer, but this can come about only by a marked reduction in its cost. So long as valuable stock foods, such as tankage, cottonseed meal, and dried blood are used as fertilizers for the sake of the nitrogen they contain, our fertilizers will not be cheap, for these materials are valuable for feeding purposes and should be used as such. So long as the phosphoric acid in phosphate rock is made available to the plant by treating it with sulphuric acid, thereby diluting it 50 per cent while adding nothing to its fertilizer content, fertilizers will not be cheap, but when this Congress makes it possible to apply low-priced hydroelectric power to take the nitrogen from the atmosphere and to concentrate instead of dilute the phosphoric acid from the phosphate rock and produce for the farmer a concentrated material that is 75 per cent plant food to take the place of the mixtures containing 12 to 14 per cent plant food that are those in common use to-day, then we will have taken the first step toward the conservation of our soil fertility by supplying to agriculture its plant-food requirements at lower cost.

Even in such a State as Vermont, as close as it is to the seaboard, it has been found that the farmers there pay $1 for plant food which has a value at seaboard of 57 cents.

Experts such as Dr. Whitney, Chief of the Bureau of Soils, have shown how these highly concentrated plant foods can be produced at Muscle Shoals, and Mr. Ford has agreed to make them in accordance with the demand of agriculture, and it is agriculture in the person of representatives of the farmers themselves who comprise the majority of the board which, under the Ford plan, exercises supervision over the fertilizer output at Muscle Shoals.

The National Fertilizer Association admitted, through the testimony of its president (House Hearings, p. 523) that it is opposed to the acceptance of the Ford offer, and has circulated propaganda among the Members of this Congress. Why are they opposed to Ford? Because they know, as any reasonable man knows, that if there can be substituted a material 75 per cent plant food to take the place of material only 15 per cent plant food, so that 1 ton of the new material will go as far as 5 tons of the old material, and if this new material is distributed directly to the farmers themselves, cutting out a long string of profit takers, the savings in freight, bags, handling, and distribution will practically cut the cost of fertilizer in half, even if Mr. Ford is unable to show any important reductions in the cost per pound of the plant foods which he produces. Ford has a method which is bound to reduce the cost per pound of all commercial fertilizer.

Muscle Shoals is not the only water power in the United States, and I believe that the statements which have been made regarding the comparison between this power and the powers of the West have been largely exaggerated. It is a well-known fact that the largest deposits of phosphate rock in the world lies in that region where the States of Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming come together. In that territory are also some of the very largest water powers in the United States, and it is my belief that when Mr. Ford has shown the way at Muscle Shoals there will result on a much larger scale the development of concentrated fertilizers near these western phosphate deposits, and there will be produced fertilizer materials that will stand shipment to practically any point in the United States with economy.

The question has been raised as to what would happen under this contract if Mr. Ford should die, and the question is a pertinent one, for one has only to study the contract to see that the company organized by Mr. Ford, and which will have a large investment in Muscle Shoals, is dependent for its value upon the maintenance of the terms of the contract, and will be unqualifiedly bound to continue to produce fertilizer at 8 per cent, and not above 8 per cent, of the actual annual cost of production. And if, as has been suggested, it should happen that those who now oppose Mr. Ford might secure control of the farm organizations and obtain control of the board which determines the price of fertilizer, it may be safely suggested that the farmers of this country are intelligent enough to protect their own interests and remove disloyal representatives.

As to the Alabama Power Co. contract, I do not believe that any fair-minded man can sit down and wade through that contract, in which an effort is made on the part of the Alabama Power Co. to take advantage of every possible turn of future circumstances, without the feeling that the power company sought to take an unwarranted and unjust advantage of the Government in its extremity of war.

The contention of Mr. Ford that the Gorgas plant is necessary to the economical operation of Muscle Shoals, because of its economical size and location with respect to the coal supply, seems to me to be a fair and reasonable contention; and when I read paragraph 23 of the Alabama Power Co. contract I find that they themselves realize that if a successor to the United States should undertake the operation of the nitrate plant he would require the full amount of power at the Gorgas plant, and they, therefore, provided that he should procure this power, but at a high price and under conditions of severe restrictions.

I fully agree with the expressed opinions of the Judge Advocate General and the Attorney General that in the eyes of the law this Shylock contract has no standing and is null and void. So far as a moral obligation is concerned, if the contract had been a fair one, bearing unquestionable evidence of good faith and right intention, I would urge that it be carried out in full, however lacking in legality it may be, for I do not agree that the Government of the United States should avoid an obligation on a technicality, if that obligation were entered into with good faith on both sides. But I agree with the Graham investigating committee, when in their final report on the Alabama Power Co. contract they said that "the Alabama Power Co. does not stand in a favorable light in this contract, for it appears to have imposed upon the Government's necessities and unduly forced increases in certain of its facilities," and I do not believe that a company which would unduly force the United States into a one-sided contract in time of war thereby imposes upon this Government a moral obligation. The evidence shows that the Alabama Power Co. is controlled by an alien corporation. It is a mere subsidiary of a corporation domiciled in Canada, and this is a vital matter in case of war. From the standpoint of national defense, I believe that an operating plant maintained in accordance with the most advanced developments in the art of nitrogen fixation is incomparably superior to an obsolete plant maintained for years in idleness. The advantages of modern warfare are admitted to lie with that nation which can prepare in the least time, and in so essential an element of warfare as ammonium nitrate for explosives I believe that we can not overestimate the advantage of an operating plant of large capacity with a trained force utilizing the most efficient process when we consider the value of such a plant in the national emergency. What the cost of this provision will be to Mr. Ford and his company no one knows. The testimony is that within five years the cyanamid plant will be obsolete and he will have to wipe it off the ground, as one witness expressed it, before he can install a process of another kind. To ignore such a financial responsibility as this is to ignore one of the most important advantages of the Ford offer, and, in my opinion, one of the principal elements of expense in connection with the operation of the nitrate plant.

I appeal to every friend of the farmer, to every friend of the laboring people, to every friend of the small business people, to every lover of justice, and to every patriot in the Nation to stand by us and help to get the Henry Ford offer for the Muscle Shoals project adopted by this Congress.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order there is no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The House again divided; and the tellers (Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. SISSON) reported that there were—ayes 5, noes 195.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that no quorum is present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it does not take a quorum to adjourn, but it does take a quorum present if it is developed——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the point of order of no quorum, already pending, does not require a quorum to adjourn. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and forty-three Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to understand the logic and consistency of the position of gentlemen who claim that they are in favor of the development of Muscle Shoals but wish to postpone the construction of that great power plant. No one will deny that the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama means a postponement of the construction for one year and the postponement of the completion of this great power plant for four years instead of three years. It is stated that it will require three years' work to complete this power plant. They wish to delay it—for what? To give Congress an opportunity to act upon the Ford offer. If Congress were composed only of the House there might be some reason in that position, but everyone who has any legislative sense of the conditions existing in the other body knows that the action of this body one way or the other on the Ford offer does not mean its acceptance by this Congress at this session. All know, who are following the conditions of legislation in the other body, that after the consideration of the tariff bill and the bonus measure that body is going to adjourn for the summer until next winter. With the opposition of that body to the Henry Ford offer, led by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Senator NORRIS], who is the author of the Senate amendment, what hope is there for action being taken before January 1 next? It is the most asinine proposal that has ever been presented to the House of Representatives by those who really want the work continued on Dam No. 2.

Now, there is great need for that work being resumed. If that great water-power development is completed it will provide hydroelectric power for 300 miles around, reaching on the north beyond Louisville, on the northwest beyond St. Louis, on the west beyond Little Rock, on the south to New Orleans, on the east beyond Atlanta. There are—and that is the testimony before our committee—private water-power plants that do not want the Government to complete this project. I say to you Republicans, is it easier for the Government to enter into a contract with a private party with a completed project or with one that is only one-third completed? Did you ever hear of a person having any kind of a manufacturing plant only one-third completed who could enter into as favorable terms for its lease as could one who had a full and complete plant? And that is what is proposed here. What harm, I say, to the Democratic friends who are favorable to delay on this work for one year could come? What do you mean by delay, except that you play in the hands of the private water companies in the South, that do not want this Government to have this great water-power plant, so that they can enter into terms favorable, and to whom? Favorable to all the users of hydroelectric power within 300 miles of Florence, Tenn.

Oh, there are some here who say, "Yes; we will postpone it for a year." I think the only one who has spoken in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama advocating delay, who adopts a consistent position, is that illustrious gentleman from Tennessee, who says he will vote against any appropriation at all if the substitute amendment is not adopted. That is a consistent position. What is the need of having $7,500,000 dangling in the air without any chance of using it during the next fiscal year? Everybody knows that from January 1 on the weather conditions do not permit of the organization of the work so as to go ahead with this development.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman mean the gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. STAFFORD. I meant the gentleman from Mississippi. The gentleman from Alabama knows, and there is reason for everybody else to know, that even if this House now before the recess—and it is conceded we are not going to do it—takes action upon the Henry Ford proposition it will not be acted upon by the Senate before January 1. Better nothing at all than to put on the asinine proposal that is suggested by the gentleman from Alabama in his substitute for a delay of six months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I have 21 or 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yielded to the gentleman 22 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was yielded 20 minutes, and it has all been consumed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yielded seven minutes in order to make it one hour.

Mr. SISSON. Under the agreement I am entitled to 23 minutes. I was to get an hour. How much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not here when the debate began. The Chair is informed that the gentleman has used 30 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I have 30 additional minutes, then.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, my understanding was that there were 23 minutes due to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. That is according to my figuring. I have 23 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Mississippi was yielded 7 minutes and then later yielded 30 minutes, which he could yield to other Members.

Mr. ANTHONY. That makes 23 minutes still due to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas yields to the gentleman from Mississippi 23 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. That is what my book calls for.

Now, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, no speech can be made in only one minute's time. Unfortunately I did not apply for time in which to speak until all of the time had been allotted.

The effect of the adoption of the Senate amendment without change will be anti-Ford. The test is being put to you here to-day. If you favor the development and operation of Muscle Shoals under the Henry Ford offer, vote for the substitute which I have presented. If, on the other hand, you want to kill the Ford offer, vote against the substitute. The Senate amendment is merely a piece of hypocrisy. Its real purpose is to make an excuse to the people of this country for 12 months of inaction, to excuse your failure to act on the Ford offer for 12 long months. If you want to pretend to do something without really doing anything, vote against the substitute. If you want to make a pretense that you want the Government to develop and operate Muscle Shoals as a great water power when really in your souls you want to turn that great national asset over to the fertilizer trust, to the aluminum and the power trusts, vote against the substitute. If you want to do the work of the great financial and business interests that are fighting Henry Ford, then vote against the substitute. The choice is yours.

If it were really true that those who advocate the adoption of the Senate amendment without change wanted the Government to actually operate the Muscle Shoals plant for the people, there would be less reason to oppose them. But we know that they have no such genuine purpose. We well know that the powers which are now in control of the Government hold to no such purpose. We know that the present move is only a bluff. We know that the real object in view is to kill the Ford offer and then to turn Muscle Shoals over to the Alabama Power Co. or some other exploiting interest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the pending Ford proposal, providing for the completion and advantageous operation of the Muscle Shoals project, may be adversely affected or even defeated for all time by the passage of this proposed appropriation of $7,500,000 for the continuation of work at Muscle Shoals under Government supervision and control.

From the viewpoint of a stanch advocate of the Henry Ford offer, this proposed flat appropriation of $7,500,000, without any reference to pending offers for the Government properties at Muscle Shoals, is not wise and not justifiable. Rather than this procedure, let us have action by Congress on the Henry Ford offer.

My desire is to help all I can on any move or maneuver that will hold out any hope of action by Congress on the Ford proposal. The people all over this country of ours who are interested in the future welfare and progress of the agricultural people of the Nation want to see Henry Ford's proposed contract approved by this Congress, and I am for it. [Applause.]

Our people have said to us in unmistakable terms that they want Congress to "hurry up and approve the contract with Mr. Ford" for the great Muscle Shoals project, and they want us to work constantly to that end with a "never-say-die" spirit. [Applause.] If the leaders of the party in power in this House, and their steering committee and Rules Committee, will heed the urgent demands of the people of the country and give the House a chance to express itself on the Ford proposal, I feel sure that the House will go on record as favoring its approval. All we want is that the House be given that chance. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, it is unquestionably a matter of the greatest importance that Muscle Shoals be developed and that its vast power be used for the benefit of the people of these United States. Henry Ford said of Muscle Shoals:

> Let me have it and I will make it a wonderful development—something that will open the eyes of the world.

He and Thomas A. Edison were at Muscle Shoals when these words were spoken. No two men in the whole country could possibly know better than these two the great possibilities of this project nor foretell the huge benefit to the country that its completion will mean. Just a short distance away there exists an unlimited supply of limestone and of phosphate, also unlimited quantities of bauxite. Let me emphasize that this bauxite is used in the manufacture of aluminum. Beside this, there are also vast deposits there of asphalt and Georgia shale which contains a large per cent of potash. The value of these minerals is enormous and they can and must be used for our country to make it a better place even than now to live in, and they can be used to lessen the cost of living if they are developed into usable shape. And the beauty of the situation is these can be put into such shape, and easily, too, for the very power with which to transform these raw materials is but a few miles away from where they lie, and it will cost very little to gain the use of this power. All that is now necessary is to harness the wonderful rapids that are there ready to be used, and the greater part of the expense of doing this has already been met.

I can to-day briefly point out but a few of the advantages that await our taking immediate hold of and completing the Muscle Shoals project.

MAINTENANCE OF SOIL FERTILITY.

The first of these would be the ability to maintain the precious fertility of our soil. There is no greater obligation upon us than that of keeping up the fertility of the land from which comes our very sustenance. It is an obligation that we owe to our children. We must not allow our lands to become impoverished. For this presages a decrease in production, and this would mean disaster in the end and decay to us as a Nation in view of the fact that our population is steadily on the increase. Out of Muscle Shoals, properly developed, we can produce with comparative ease those essentials necessary to rehabilitate our lands. The lowest estimates, made at the most unfavorable time, is that the power there can easily produce 75,000 tons of fixed nitrogen. Many experts, among them Major Gillard, of the Army, say that the ultimate installed capacity will greatly exceed this. Their opinion is that the estimate should be from 175,000 tons to an amount many times in excess of this. If these estimates are true ones, and there has been no disputing of them, the farmers of the country, upon the accomplishment of this production of fixed nitrogen, will immediately be able to buy fertilizer at one-half the prices they are now paying for them, which would be a saving of about $200,000,000 yearly. This would mean, naturally, increased crop productions and the general betterment of soil conditions. It further means that our farmers would be made independent of the German Potash Trust and the Chilean Nitrate Trust, to both of which concerns they are now paying heavy tolls.

TENNESSEE RIVER NAVIGABLE TO KNOXVILLE.

Because of these rapids at Muscle Shoals the Tennessee River is unnavigable past Florence, Ala. These rapids extend for about 16 miles. Upon the completion of a dam at both ends of the rapids this part of the river would become a large lake with locks at either dam, and this construction would make it possible for boats to ply the Tennessee River all the way to Knoxville. This would mean untold prosperity for the South and through it for all other sections of the country. Freight could be transported at reasonable rates from Knoxville, Chattanooga, Huntsville, Decatur, all those cities now along that river and those that would quickly spring up along its length. This means water competition for this whole territory and water competition with railroad lines inevitably means low freight rates. Nor is this the extent of the benefit from an opening of the river. Enough surplus power would be developed to operate electric railroads to Memphis, Birmingham, Mobile, Meridian, the Gulf coast, and other sections of the country. It has been outlined also by Mr. Ford and his experts that the Tennessee River could be connected up with the Warrior River, where large barge lines are now operated by the United States Government connecting with Gulf ports.

This but adds to the compelling of lower freight rates and the consequent saving to us all.

FACTORIES WILL SECURE CHEAPER POWER.

Since coal has been the largest element of expense in the production of manufactured articles, it is clear that a cheaper power for manufacturing would result in lower prices in manufactured commodities. There is no telling how much power can ultimately be produced at Muscle Shoals, experts having placed the amount as high as 1,000,000 horsepower. They all admit that it is the greatest water power in the whole country, while some go so far as to say that it is the greatest in the world. The utilization of it, therefore, means a saving in the use of coal amounting to millions of tons, which are now paid for by the consumer. The testimony of one expert is that it will be possible to produce heat units cheaper at Muscle Shoals than anywhere else on earth. It surely does seem as if God himself gave us these rapids to use, and we certainly should be taking the great advantage of them that awaits us. They are not to be matched anywhere.

LESSENING OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

It is going to take a large number of men to furnish the labor necessary to put Muscle Shoals into operation, and this is a blessing, in that many now out of employment will be given work. And upon completion of the plant thousands of men and women will be given new and varied kinds of employment, for in this regard there is no computing the number of kinds of manufacturing that will follow the completion of the Muscle Shoals project. Mr. Edison said, "You ask me the possibilities of Muscle Shoals; I can't tell you, they are so great." Some of the witnesses testifying to the committees of Congress of the potentialities of Muscle Shoals gave as their belief that around them will be built the greatest manufacturing enterprises ever known and that cities rivaling in magnificence and size even our largest ones will spring up there as if by magic.

ASPHALT ROADS AT REASONABLE PRICES.

The rock asphalt that is near by will be converted into road materials, and these will be sold us at reasonable prices, and out of which thousands of miles of asphalt boulevards will be built throughout our country. We have already learned the value of good, hard roads—that they are necessary, and that we can not have too many of them. They have a civilizing effect and the power to increase and better both State and interstate commerce. And now there looms up the possibility of gaining those advantages that accrue to us from the building of good roads by procuring the material for them from nature herself at a very low cost. Heretofore the development of such roads has had to be slow, because their cost has been too heavy for us.

AS A WAR MEASURE.

While I do not look for another war soon, and while all of us shudder to even contemplate such a possibility, at the same time it is necessary for us to realize that there are certain matters of national defense that must have our attention. One of these is a sufficient supply of nitrogen within the borders of our own country, for without this we can not face a foreign foe. Without the means of making gunpowder—and we are very nearly without that means to-day—we might have to accept the dictates of our adversaries. For to-day, much as we hate to admit it, our stock of nitrogen must come almost entirely from foreign countries. Our last war showed us our great need for fixed nitrogen.

The amount which we produced, together with the amount we obtained from Chile, was not more than enough for our war needs, so that our lands were forced to go with too little of this needed fertilizer, and it has been said that if the war had continued another year our lands would have been hungry for it. Had this come to pass, then we ourselves would be soon hungry because of this starving of the lands. We are now using for agricultural purposes about 180,000 tons of fixed nitrogen annually and should be using more than this for our lands. As a war measure, then, as well as a peace measure, Muscle Shoals should be completed.

FORD THE ONE PERSON TO OPERATE IT.

I believe that the one person to take over the Muscle Shoals plant when completed and run it is Henry Ford. The American people have the utmost confidence in his ability to do things. They believe in his integrity and that he has a sincere regard for their best interests and that he could make for their interests the most out of this huge and wonderful project. Those who are now engaged in fighting him are being actuated by sordid selfishness and are devoid of true patriotism.

I am glad that it seems to be the sentiment of this House that these self-centered, money-grabbing interests shall not be successful in their dastardly work. It was Ford who saw the wonderful advantages that could be had for the American people by the completion of the Muscle Shoals project, and it was he who focussed the attention of the people on it so that he is more generally responsible than any other man for the desire of the people of this country that Muscle Shoals be completed and put into operation for their benefit. It is surely to our interest that his reasonable contract be accepted as speedily as possible.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase the gentleman from Alabama but not follow his lame logic, I say if you want to start the Muscle Shoals development, vote to concur in the Senate amendment; if you want to delay the Muscle Shoals development, vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. That is the proposition before the House right now.

A year ago, when this matter was under consideration, there were but few Members of the House who knew enough about the Muscle Shoals development or situation to have a very intelligent opinion as to whether or no we should expend any more money there or make any further effort at development through Federal aid. We have now progressed with consideration and examination of the matter far enough that I think most of us are of the opinion that Dam No. 2 should be completed; that whatever shall be done thereafter as to the use of the power and the development of enterprises there, we should at least go forward and complete the dam. And in view of the conditions at and surrounding the dam, the work of completing it should be undertaken without any further delay. If we should eventually accept Mr. Ford's offer, or any like offer, it would be necessary—at least, we would be urged—to make even a larger appropriation than that carried in this bill. So that nothing is lost by making the appropriation now and much may be gained. Mr. Ford's offer is in no way prejudiced, and we do gain the advantage of putting an end to the deterioration going on down there in the temporary work, the machinery, and other property, and of getting the project under way.

I do not know that many of us are now prepared—I think comparatively few on this side are—to say that we should accept Mr. Ford's offer. It has been asserted by some that if the offer made by Mr. Ford had been made by anyone else, it would have been accepted long ago. My own opinion is that if that offer had been made by anyone except Henry Ford, no one would have given it any serious consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. Ford is considered a sort of miracle man, and therefore a lot of folks expect much of an offer he makes without taking the trouble to find out what it is. Some one says Henry Ford is going to make fertilizer cheap, and without inquiry that statement is taken as gospel.

In saying that, I do not mean to say that there is no merit at all in the offer. Far from it. But the offer is so very extraordinary—what the Government is asked to do is so tremendous and so stupendous, and what Mr. Ford offers is so trifling—that if anyone else were to have made the offer I am sure it would have been treated with suspicion, if not derision, from one end of the country to the other. And yet it may possibly develop that that is the best we can do. If it does so develop and we accept it, then we shall have lost about $75,000,000 of investment already made, and we shall tax the American people some $50,000,000 more in the hope—and I am a little afraid in the vain hope—that we may secure the manufacture of fertilizer at a low price.

What Mr. Ford asks is that we shall give him some $68,000,000 worth of property for $5,000,000, and that we shall then give him the use of $17,000,000 more in the form of an unfinished dam, and on top of that we shall put $50,000,000 more of the taxpayers' money into that dam and other dams, and shall take all the risk of those dams for 100 years, Mr. Ford promising us to make "payment," as he naively calls it, for our additional expenditure on the dams, the said "payment" being the turning over to the Government at stated times during a period of 100 years of sums aggregating less than $5,000,000, to wipe out the $50,000,000 obligation.

I have said to gentlemen on both sides that if they can find anywhere in all the history of financial operations any case anywhere where anybody wiped out a loan by the payment of a tenth part of the principal, I shall be willing to accept the Ford offer without further discussion. But as I never heard of just that sort of thing before, I want a little time in which to study and digest that novel and extraordinary new development in high finance. This sale of Government property to Mr. Ford at about 5 cents on the dollar of cost and this further vast loan to be wiped out by payment of less than 10 per cent of the principal of the loan are justified, we are told, because Mr. Ford is to make a lot of cheap fertilizer, but Mr. Ford does not promise to make a dollar's worth of fertilizer unless he can make it with an 8 per cent profit. I do not know of anybody anywhere who would not be willing to use property so easily acquired in the manufacture of fertilizer if he could be guaranteed an 8 per cent return.

We are now complaining very greatly about railroad rates, under which the railroads are earning 3 per cent on the value of their property, and we have a law under which, if the railroads earn more than 5½ per cent, they must divide with the Government 50–50. But when we come to do business with Mr. Ford in the manufacture of fertilizer for the farmer, we are to allow him to earn 8 per cent. If under that contract Mr. Ford could not make 8 per cent on the manufacture of fertilizer, he could not be compelled to make a pound of it. There is not a court in the world that would compel him to do it.

I am not saying there is no virtue in the Ford offer. I am calling attention to the fact that the Ford offer is not what it has been advertised to be. It does not guarantee fertilizer to anybody unless Mr. Ford makes an 8 per cent profit. It is true, a lot of folks have been led to believe that this offer to take Government property at one-twentieth of what it cost and to pay back to the taxpayers 10 per cent of this for the vast loans that are proposed is justified on the ground that vast quantities of fertilizer will be made and sold at a low price. That might occur and it might not, for there is no binding guaranty to manufacture a pound of fertilizer unless it can be manufactured at a good round profit.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield—I have only a moment. It may be that that is the best we can do. But let us not fool ourselves. Least of all, let us not try to fool the farmers and the producers and the consumers of the country. It may be that we will find that this is the best bargain that we can get out of the enormous investment the Government has made down there. I think we can do better. I think Mr. Ford can afford to make a much better offer. There are a lot of folks—some here now—who were enthusiastic over Mr. Ford's first offer. Yet everyone now admits that offer was faulty in many respects. Some are for this offer because they think it good politics to be; some are for it because they are much more interested in having a great industry started at Muscle Shoals than they are in guarding the Treasury or furnishing the farmers fertilizer. We ought to have time to consider these matters, and in the meantime, unlike the gentlemen who have been so insistent heretofore on having this started, but who now preach delay, I want to start Muscle Shoals right away. I am not in favor of waiting until some other action shall be taken later. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it was not because of lack of information that the majority party defeated the amendment offered to appropriate $10,000,000 to complete the Wilson Dam two years ago.

Mr. MANN. A year ago.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. They were informed; they are informed now. It is not because of a desire for time to study the Ford proposition that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] now reverses the position which he took a year ago and insists upon this appropriation of $7,500,000. The purpose is not to study in order to do, but to study in order not to do. The gentleman from Wyoming insists now that the dam shall be started. What will the gentleman do with the nitrate plant? Since December, 1918, the greatest manufacturing plant for fertilizer in the world has been standing idle. There was introduced into the House, coming upon the recommendation of the War Department, and in conformity with the national defense act, section 124, a bill under which that plant could be operated in peace time for the purposes defined in that act. It was defeated. The action of the party which was then the majority and which is now the majority was to say, "Let us wait; we do not wish the Government to go into this; the Government should not go into private business. Let us see what can be done in the way of private offers by private individuals." We have an offer now.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman from Mississippi give me two minutes more?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. GARRRETT of Tennessee. You have a private offer now. Let me ask the gentleman from Wyoming this: Give us just a chance now, before we adjourn, to vote upon this bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and thrash out the matter, and let us settle this great question.

We are willing for that. Will the gentleman give us an opportunity to vote upon it? We are willing to defer action upon this conference report until that can be decided. Are gentlemen willing to give us that opportunity?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Tennessee seems to desire to discuss and act upon anything that is not before the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am wondering if the gentleman will not let that matter come before the House. We will act upon it then. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was in favor of the Muscle Shoals appropriation a year ago, and voted with the Democratic side of the House and some of the Republicans in favor of it, and most of the Republicans voted against it. What is the proposition now? The Senate offers an amendment to appropriate $7,500,000 to proceed with Dam No. 2. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] proposes that that shall not be available until the 1st of October. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] proposes in effect by his amendment that it shall not be available until the 1st of January. On what plea? On the plea that meanwhile the Congress may have authorized a contract to be entered into with Henry Ford. I think I am in favor of the Henry Ford proposition. [Applause.] I am in favor of utilizing this power plant down there for the manufacture of nitrates for fertilizer if that be possible, and I think it is. But here is a proposition to spend some money and do some work. Our Democratic friends propose to postpone it. For what? For imagination. No man believes that the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs will be a law by January 1 next. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] just said he was willing to postpone the disposition of this conference report until the House had voted upon that bill. What good would that do? If you should postpone the conference report on the Army bill until this other bill is a law the Army would be without support for many months.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Very briefly. I have only five minutes, and I am saying something.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not say until it became a law. I said until the House voted on it.

Mr. MANN. I did not say the gentleman did. I said until the House voted upon it. What good would that do? It would amount to nothing. Supposing you postponed it until the House voted on the proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would indicate——

Mr. MANN. Let me take my time. I did not interrupt the gentleman. I have not unfairly stated the gentleman's position. The Henry Ford contract will not be entered into, under the most favorable circumstances, by the 1st of next January; and under the amendment which you propose to vote for this appropriation is available for expenditure on the 1st of January. You have gained nothing except to delay progress upon this work. I can understand how this side of the House might vote for your proposition. I can not understand how men who are in favor of the development of Muscle Shoals, in favor of the manufacture of nitrates, in favor even of the Henry Ford proposition, will vote to delay the work and thereby offer an excuse in the future for further delay. I believe in picking a cherry when it is ripe. It is ripe now to make the appropriation to proceed with the work. All of that can be taken into consideration when the bill is passed or the contract entered into with Mr. Ford, and this is only to delay, and if you delay this you take the responsibility of possibly defeating the whole enterprise for perhaps years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] four minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for 30 years this Congress has been debating the matter of Muscle Shoals. During the last two or three years no one has taken a more active interest than I in this matter. My stand has usually been opposed to that of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle. To-day I have come to the conclusion, after the best thought I can give to this subject, that the proposition to appropriate $7,500,000 to be spent on this dam without any policy approved or adopted is the height of folly. [Applause.] What are you to appropriate your $7,500,000 for? What are you going to do with it? You are starting out and engaging upon a program of spending at least $28,000,000, to be spent in three or four years, to get what? To get a dam across the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River which will not benefit navigation any without the other two dams. And what are you going to do with it when you get the dam? You will have a dam across the Tennessee River without any policy adopted, and of course only one of two things can be done with it. One is Government operation. Is there anybody on this side of the House who wants that? Was not a vote cast here a year ago in protest against that very thing? When we had our vote on the $10,000,000 appropriation it was a protest against Government operation of this plant; and we said then, as did the committee of which I was chairman, in its report at that time, that we did not favor any more appropriations on this plant until we had some policy.

Let me quote from the recommendations of the Select Committee on Expenditures made to this House by the unanimous vote of the Republican members of that committee May 18, 1920:

> 5. That no further funds should be expended by the War Department on the Muscle Shoals plant, and no further appropriations for alterations, changes, or additions to said plant should be made by Congress for the use of the War Department or any agency of the Government acting under or through said War Department until some policy as to the future of said plant shall be determined upon by Congress.

Now, gentlemen on this side of the House, the burden is upon us to fix a policy here. Our Secretary of War, to whom this matter was referred, has referred it back to us, and we have not done anything, and now in order to avoid responsibility we spend $7,500,000 on something when we do not know what the end of it will be.

Let me tell you something else. I have looked into this proposition, and if we start to build this dam down there we are building it for the Alabama Power Co. and nobody else. There is nobody else in that field that can lease that plant. Are we going to operate it ourselves? Are we going to build transmission lines all over that country and sell this power ourselves? No; we would probably lease or sell the plant after we have finished it, and there is only one corporation in that locality that can take it, and that is the corporation that has the whole field covered with its transmission lines, that to-day has this great steam-power plant under lease, and that has that whole territory covered as a commercial proposition. That is the Alabama Power Co. Who wants that company to get it? Gentlemen, let us fix the policy before we spend any more money. Are you willing to spend $28,000,000 when we do not know what we are spending it for?

I tell you that the evidence taken before the committee shows that this plant will not seriously deteriorate in the next few months or the next year, and therefore it is wise and advisable to know what we are spending the people's money for and who is to spend it. I for one, although I may be in the minority on the Republican side, do not propose to start out and pay $28,000,000 of the people's money that my constituents have to help pay in taxes before I know what I am voting this money for. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there is no joker as far as the fertilizer clause is concerned, and the farmers know it. Every single word in the fertilizer clause is satisfactory to the farmers' organizations. This matter is not a political question. I was asked not to introduce it because I am a Republican. I come from a Republican district, with 35,000 or 40,000 majority. This was not a political question before our committee. There was only one man who raised the question of politics, and he was a Republican from Tennessee, Gov. Alfred Taylor. He begged our committee, saying he hoped, the majority of the committee being Republican, it would not turn down the offer because Muscle Shoals was located in the South. As far as the committee was concerned at no time has the word "politics" been mentioned.

This proposition was sent to us by whom? By a Democrat? No; by Secretary of War Weeks. If you are going to criticize the Republicans, criticize Mr. Weeks, because he sent it to a Republican committee. He tried to get men to take it; he peddled it all over the country. Nobody wanted it. Henry Ford was the first man who made any proposition, and the first proposition submitted by Henry Ford was not satisfactory to any of us. We did not believe there was a fertilizer guaranty, but there was not a single word of that proposition drawn up by any attorney representing Mr. Ford. At no time in any proposition made to Congress or our committee has a single word been drafted by the attorney for Mr. Ford. The original proposition was drawn up in the office of the Judge Advocate General, a Republican, and the fertilizer clause was drawn up in our committee room. Some say it was a joker, but the language was agreed to by some who signed the minority report. In fact, some of them helped to draft the language. There is a guaranty in it. It means that the farmer will have 2,000,000 tons of fertilizer per year, and is a positive guaranty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. JAMES. In addition to that we are going to save $100,000 a year that we are now spending for guards at nitrate plant No. 2. It is worth $100,000 per year for 100 years to keep that nitrate concern going. It costs $400,000 a year in the depreciation of the coffer dam, and so forth, and it is costing us for the little locks and dams about $70,000 a year. We will save that and in addition we will save the money we are paying Hugh L. Cooper. They say he is working for a dollar a year, but let me say to you that they, his firm, are getting $10,000 a month out of the Government because of the cost-plus contract, and we will save that. Every man that works for Hugh L. Cooper that he pays $200 a month to, Uncle Sam pays $360. We will save that.

Talk about not having the time to discuss this matter, why they are going to get us back here in a month to pass the ship subsidy bill. We will have time to discuss that and we will have time to discuss this proposition. For four months the Military Affairs Committee met many times twice a day and the rest of the time once a day and discussed the Muscle Shoals proposition. All this amendment means is that when we are called back in August or September, after having spent four months in the committee, we will have a chance to present these views. If it passes, all right, and if it does not pass it will make no difference in the appropriation of the seven and a half million dollars. I beg that every man who favors the proposal and believes in Ford's offer will vote for one of these two amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, for many months the Military Affairs Committee has been working daily on the subject of Muscle Shoals. As the gentleman who has preceded me said, there has been no politics in the consideration of the matter before the committee. A large number of our committee, with the Senate committee, went to Muscle Shoals. Personally, before I went to Muscle Shoals I was in favor of the Ford project. After I saw the Wilson Dam, the nitrate plants, 1 and 2, and all the rest of this vast project, and realized that under the Ford offer the completion of the property in any possible way meant the ultimate expenditure by the United States of $167,000,000 in what has been spent and what must be spent, I felt that we must retain control of this plant as a nitrate plant for the Nation in time of war and a fertilizer plant in time of peace. The project is too great a project to be disposed of by the Government except under the most careful consideration. Whatever is done ultimately the Wilson Dam must be completed. Under the Ford offer the United States also must put up the money to complete it. I do not believe in the present Ford offer. I do not say that Mr. Ford or some one else could not make an offer that would be acceptable. At the present time the Ford offer is the only offer that has been reported to this House.

I rise to speak against both of these amendments, the purpose of which is to delay work on the Wilson Dam. The visit that we made to Muscle Shoals convinced every Member there that the work on that dam should go forward at once. We are losing $400,000 a year in deterioration. The summer season is approaching. There are dangers of all sorts there. Even if you finally accept Mr. Ford's offer, you have got to put up the money to build that dam, because there can be no cheap fertilizer without water power, and I want to say to the gentlemen on the Democratic side who are opposing the immediate appropriation of $7,500,000 that they do not realize that the people in that neighborhood want to have that project started at once and have 4,000 men started on that work. I am for the Senate appropriation without any change. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER].

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to differ with my colleagues from my section of the country on this vote for the appropriation to begin work on the Wilson Dam. The people of my section are more interested in the solution of the Muscle Shoals problem than in any other now before Congress. The delay in the development has been difficult to explain. The work to be done by the Army engineers with this appropriation will not interfere with the final acceptance of the Ford offer. The expenses at the present time of keeping the equipment used in the construction of the dam in a stand-by condition are very heavy. General Taylor and Colonel Barden have stated the expenses were about $35,000 to $40,000 per month, and this does not include the deterioration of the temporary construction and equipment. Nearly $400,000 has been paid out since work stopped on the dam in April, 1921, and none of it added one thing to the completion of the work.

On the Committee on Military Affairs I have voted for the acceptance of the Ford offer as amended and have hoped for its early consideration by Congress. Of the 21 members of the committee only 8 voted to recommend the acceptance of the offer as finally amended. A majority has, however, submitted the offer and urged the early consideration of it by Congress.

In considering whether this appropriation without limitation would be a handicap to the Ford offer it is interesting to see the point of view of that distinguished Democrat, who for so long was the leader of the now minority party in this body and who is now the leader of the minority party in the Senate. When the item was before the Senate he said:

> If Mr. Ford's proposition comes before the Senate I shall vote for it, but that question is not involved here now. I think it would be a waste of money and a waste of time for the Government to wait until we determine what we are going to do with the dam before we finish it. I think it will be a much better asset to dispose of if we proceed to finish it at once.

There are other obstacles to the Ford offer which are more serious than would be an adjustment as to the expenditures made by the engineers under this bill if the offer should be accepted after work had again started. Then there is the legislative situation. We are preparing to take a recess for several weeks, extending to nearly the middle of August. Personally, I would be glad to vote to stay here and dispose of this most important matter instead of taking a recess.

In the Senate the chairman of the committee which has the Ford offer before it said:

> I do not believe that with the business before the Senate and the other branch of Congress that there is a possibility during this session of Congress of settling what the permanent policy toward Muscle Shoals shall be. I have reached that conclusion not because I want to but because it seems to me that the facts before us are so impelling that no man who will consider it can reach any other conclusion.

If work is begun and the amended offer is accepted the adjustment as to the dam could easily be brought about. Mr. Ford wants the Muscle Shoals properties, for he has on several occasions given statements to the press showing his determination to continue to fight for Muscle Shoals notwithstanding the delays in the consideration of his offer. In the New York Times he is quoted as saying:

> That Wall Street will have no part either in financing or operating Muscle Shoals if I can help it. If it is the last thing I do I'll exert every resource and influence at my command to keep the hands of Wall Street off the Shoals project and perpetuate that as a great example to the American people—a living example of what they can do if they will safeguard the country's water power and develop it.

And again,

> If the selfish Wall Street interests which, behind the scenes, have been delaying and misrepresenting our proposition, will come out in the open and make the Government a better offer, than mine, I'll fall right in and cooperate and help them and the Government in any way I can. And if they think they can get over a less worthy private offer I notify them now that the fight for Muscle Shoals so far has been but a skirmish. We will exert every resource at our command to keep Muscle Shoals out of the hands of Wall Street.

An able Army officer, who discussed the offer and plan of development with him, states that:

> He aspires to go down in history as the man who has done the most to develop the agricultural resources of his country and the agricultural possibilities of the world.

Certainly a man inspired as this man appears to be in his desire to render a great service to the farmers of our country would not be thwarted in this great ambition by an adjustment which would mean that the end to which he is striving had been brought nearer by the work on the dam made possible by this appropriation.

It is stated by the Army engineers that the work on the dam could be completed in three low-water seasons, and it is very important that the work start now so that the season which is just beginning will not be lost. General Taylor has stated that the work would begin the day after the money was available.

The people of the country, however, are entitled to an early consideration of the Ford offer. There is a very strong sentiment in favor of the acceptance of this offer. It would remove the question of the Government going into business, for unless some private concern can be induced to take over one or both of the nitrate plants and operate them, it will be the duty of the Government as contemplated under the national defense act of 1916 to operate one of them.

> For the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products.

Everybody agrees that the Government should maintain nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals as a war emergency, because it is now well known that at some time during the war our nitrate supply, which we had to get from Chile, was dangerously near exhaustion. At one time we were within four weeks of exhausting our entire nitrate supply. General Williams, the Chief of Ordnance, reported that—

> If the Ford offer means, in the case of the No. 2 plant, that such plant will be operated at its approximate present capacity for the fixation of nitrogen, it is most satisfactory from the standpoint of nitrogen preparedness, for it guarantees the establishment of the nitrogen fixation business on a large, long-enduring, and commercial basis. In other words, it completes the objective which the Ordnance Department believes essential for the making of the United States able to be self-sustaining in its supply of nitrogen compounds.

General Beach stated before the committee that—

> I can not understand anybody who is acquainted with the conditions being willing to put the United States in such a position that in case of hostilities it would have to depend upon securing its nitrates from a foreign source of supply.

Then there is no feature of the Ford offer which has been so popular with the people as the provisions relating to the manufacture of fertilizers. Mr. Ford's representative has stated that it was his belief that with the water power available at Muscle Shoals he will be able to make fertilizer at about half the price it is sold for to-day.

The two other outstanding features of the Ford offer are the navigation and water-power development.

The committee have had most elaborate hearings on both of these matters. The engineers of our Army indorse the navigation features and urge the acceptance of the offer, for this development would be difficult to ever obtain unless combined with a project as presented by Mr. Ford. The possibilities of the water-power development are immense. From the Wilson Dam there will be 100,000 horsepower 97 per cent of the time, and for six months of the year there will be available over 300,000 horsepower. It seems to me that the sooner work is started the better.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, Muscle Shoals is in the district which I have the honor to represent and within 6 miles of my home. You may recall that I have heretofore made some reference to the wonderful development at Muscle Shoals and the importance of its completion. [Applause.]

About 15 months ago the appropriation to continue the work on the Muscle Shoals Dam No. 2 was defeated in this House by a very close vote. Some of the leaders of the majority party at that time stated that probably the dam should be finished, but thought that it should go over until the new administration could investigate it and report to Congress.

This investigation was made, and it is now the opinion of almost everyone familiar with the subject that the Dam No. 2 should be completed. The question before the House at this time is whether the $7,500,000 appropriated in the Senate amendment to continue the work for the next fiscal year shall be made available October 1 or immediately available, as provided in the Senate amendment.

It seems that most of the supporters of the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals believe that it would be in the interest of the Ford offer to make it available October 1, in order that Congress may in the meantime have an opportunity to pass upon the Ford offer. If the Ford offer is accepted, the dams will be built by the Ford company under the direction of the Chief of Engineers.

While I realize the importance of the resumption of work as soon as possible, still I am willing to wait until October 1 in order to make the acceptance of the Ford offer more certain. I must attribute some of the criticism of the Ford offer which has been made on the floor of the House to-day to be due to want of information on the subject. I believe that any fair and impartial person who will study the provisions of the Ford offer carefully will come to the conclusion that it will be to the best interest of the Government and the taxpayers to have it accepted by Congress.

Mr. Ford has offered more for the nitrate plants than any other war plants have been sold for heretofore. He offers 4 per cent as an annual rental for the use of the power on whatever amount it may cost to complete the water-power development and at the same time to create a sinking fund which will repay to the Government at the expiration of the lease the amounts advanced by the Government to complete the dams.

There should be no objection to the 100-year lease period. Muscle Shoals is in a class to itself. It will require such a long time to secure a market and use for the immense amount of power that will be developed that no financial interest could afford to undertake the development proposed by Henry Ford for a shorter period of time.

The Military Committee of the House has reported that no other offer for Muscle Shoals, except that of Henry Ford, is worthy of consideration. The Ford bill has been favorably reported to the House by the Military Committee, and I again appeal to the Republican leaders to give us a vote on it without further delay and before there is any recess. In the event the majority forces a recess I trust that the Members will study the Ford offer during the recess and get the views of their constituents on the subject so that it may be disposed of promptly after the recess.

If you will follow me I will explain the Ford offer, and I believe that you will agree with me that it should be accepted. In the first place I call your attention to what has been done and the condition at Muscle Shoals, and then discuss the provisions of the Ford agreement.

During the recent World War the Government constructed at Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River, in northern Alabama, two nitrate plants, known as Nos. 1 and 2, for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen to be used for the manufacture of explosives for war purposes and fertilizer in peace times. The war-time cost of these plants amounted to a total of $85,423,078.73, including the Gorgas steam plant and the Waco rock quarry, which is about twice the amount of cost of construction in normal peace times. In addition to this about $17,000,000 has been expended on the Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, known as the Wilson Dam. It was about 30 per cent complete when work was suspended last May, the appropriation of $10,000,000 to continue work on the dam having been defeated by 11 votes in the House on February 25, 1921.

At the small nitrate plant No. 1 the synthetic process of the General Chemical Co., which had not been developed on a commercial basis, was used. The Haber process was not available in this country at that time, but is now and is being used successfully, I am informed, in a small plant at Syracuse, N. Y.

Plant No. 1 was an experimental plant. Certain parts of it were not a success. The War Department has decided not to ask Congress for the large amount of money that would be necessary to make it a success, but has recommended that it be salvaged.

The large plant, No. 2, at Muscle Shoals uses the cyanamid process of the American Cyanamide Co. The cyanamid process for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is one of the oldest and best. It is being used extensively and successfully in the European countries and was during and before the World War. Plant No. 2 was built in about eight months, being completed just as the war ended. It is 100 per cent in quantity and quality of production contracted for, viz, 110,000 tons ammonium nitrate annually, as has been demonstrated by a number of Government tests. Both plants are now being kept in a stand-by condition.

The development at Muscle Shoals is not local, it is a great national project and is nation-wide in the uses for which it was intended. This development, as planned in the Ford offer, will be of great benefit to the entire country. Muscle Shoals was selected for this development on account of its natural advantages, namely, within the safety zone prescribed by the military authorities; the greatest water power east of the Mississippi River; in close proximity to the phosphate beds, coal, coke, limestone rock, and all other raw materials in inexhaustible quantities needed in the manufacture of munitions and fertilizer; climatic conditions ideal; central point for the distribution of fertilizer; transportation facilities good, both by rail and water.

PLANTS BUILT TO MAKE FERTILIZER AND MUNITIONS.

At the earnest solicitation of those who were interested in the question of national defense and agriculture, provision was made in section 124 of the national defense act, approved June 6, 1916, for the construction of one or more nitrogen plants to be used for the manufacture of explosives in times of war and fertilizer in peace times, to be operated by steam or water power—one or both. As a result of that legislation the Government, through its authorized representatives, made these improvements at Muscle Shoals. In the consideration of this question it is most important that you bear in mind that these nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals and the water-power development which has been commenced was just as much intended for the production of cheaper and better fertilizer for the farmers in times of peace as for the manufacture of explosives in times of war. This was clearly the expressed intention of Congress when their construction was authorized.

After our experiences during the World War everybody agrees that this country should never again be dependent upon a foreign market for a supply of nitrogen in times of emergency, and all agree that nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals should be preserved and maintained as a part of our national defense.

Soon after the beginning of the present administration Secretary of War Weeks announced that he would not recommend to Congress the appropriation of funds with which to complete Muscle Shoals Dam No. 2, known as the Wilson Dam, unless he was first assured that there would be a market for the power developed by its completion that would justify the additional expenditure. In order to secure this information the Secretary of War requested the Chief of Engineers of the War Department to ascertain from water-power companies and others who might be interested in using a large amount of water power if they would be interested in taking the power if the dam was finished.

As a result, the Chief of Engineers received several replies—one from the Southern Power Co., in which it was not only stated that they would not be interested in taking the power but strongly condemned the project, declaring that it was impracticable and worthless, and recommended and advised against the completion of the development. Muscle Shoals has become very valuable in the estimation of the Southern Power Co. and other water-power and fertilizer interests since Mr. Ford made his offer. Why this sudden change of heart?

As a further result of the policy of Secretary of War Weeks, an offer was made by Henry Ford which made provision not only for the completion of the Wilson Dam but for the construction of the other dam, No. 3, thereby developing all the water power at Muscle Shoals and removing all obstruction to navigation, and also providing for the operation of the large nitrate plant, No. 2, for the manufacture of fertilizer.

The Ford offer was made on the 8th day of July, 1921. Negotiations were conducted between Mr. Ford and the Secretary of War for several months, and no other offers were made until after the Ford offer was sent to Congress, February 2, 1922.

The Secretary of War announced that he was without authority to dispose of this property and sent both of the offers to Congress with his comments, but without recommendations, and they were referred to the Agricultural Committee of the Senate and the Military Affairs Committee of the House.

FORD OFFER FOR MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. Ford's proposal consists of two parts—one, to lease the dams, and two, to purchase the nitrate plants and accessories.

PART 1.—OFFER TO LEASE THE DAMS.

PROVISIONS OF OFFER.

1. Mr. Ford agrees to pay $55,000 annually for the maintenance of dams, locks, etc., making a total payment in 100 years of	$5,500,000
2. He agrees to pay interest at 4 per cent on whatever the cost may be for completing both dams. If this amounts to $42,000,000 (the estimate of Mr. Ford's engineers), the total in 100 years under Mr. Ford's plan of payments will amount to	161,040,000
3. He agrees to a plan of amortization sufficient to retire $49,000,000 in 100 years	49,000,000
Total payments to the Government under Ford offer during 100-year lease period	215,540,000

Cost of dams (expended and proposed).

There has been expended to date in building Dam No. 2		$17,000,000
Cost of completing Dam No. 2	$23,000,000
Cost of building Dam No. 3	17,000,000
		40,000,000
Total Government investment in Muscle Shoals dams and hydroelectric plants will amount to a total of		57,000,000

Charges to navigation: Deducting the $49,000,000 which Mr. Ford repays from the $57,000,000 total cost leaves $8,000,000 unrefunded, which is less than the amount stated by the United States engineers as chargeable to navigation, their pre-war estimates being $8,575,000. (See Rivers and Harbors Committee (H. R.) Doc. 20, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 4, par. 6.)

The United States engineers have more than once recommended that $8,575,000 should be charged to the navigation improvement of the Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River under the very plans for joint navigation and power improvement now proposed.

Earnings from Government peace-time investments compared with Ford offer: To meet the terms of the Ford offer and produce a proportionate return to the Government, the Reclamation Service, representing a Government net investment of $125,870,830, would have to show an annual gross income of $10,180,132, instead of $4,191,844, which it now shows. The Panama Canal, representing an investment of $380,554,949, would have had to earn $32,450,886 gross revenue, whereas last year's total revenues were only $12,040,117. (Based on 1921 report.)

PART 2.—OFFER TO PURCHASE NITRATE PLANTS AND ACCESSORIES.

Provisions of offer: Mr. Ford offers to purchase nitrate plants Nos. 1 and 2, Waco Quarry, and the Gorgas steam plant and its transmission line for $5,000,000. He has offered to maintain nitrate plant No. 2 in a state of readiness to be promptly operated in the manufacture of materials necessary in time of war for the production of explosives, thus securing the benefit of its use for the purpose for which the plant was originally planned. The Government, therefore, retains every advantage of the nitrate plant in time of war, but pays nothing for the maintenance of the nitrate property in times of peace.

Salvage to Government from war-time investments compared with Ford offer.

Government property sold.	Cost of property.	Salvage received.	Per cent of cost salvaged.
Muscle Shoals nitrate plants	$85,423,078.73	$5,000,000	5.85
Old Hickory powder plant	80,000,000.00	3,500,000	4.28
Wooden ships, U. S. S. B., each	800,000.00	5,000	.63

On the basis of the price received for the wooden ships that were sold Mr. Ford would have offered only $567,000, instead of $5,000,000, for the nitrate plants.

Annual cash saving to Government by acceptance of Ford offer: The Ford offer, when accepted, will stop the following annual cash expenditures:

1. Guarding and maintaining nitrate plants and accessories (fiscal year ended June 30, 1921), depreciation omitted	$310,042.44
2. Guarding and maintaining uncompleted work at Dam No. 2, representing a yearly expenditure of	384,000.00
3. Maintaining Muscle Shoals Canal, average annual cost	53,079.00
Total annual cash saving	747,121.44

This is interest at 4 per cent on $18,678,000.

Cost to Government of the delay in accepting Ford offer.

Average annual cash return to the Government under Ford offer	$2,155,400
Annual cash expenditures saved at Muscle Shoals by Ford offer	747,121
Total annual loss to Government by delay	2,902,521
Average monthly loss	241,877
Loss since Ford offer was made, 8 months ago	1,935,016

The cost of the delay in accepting Mr. Ford's offer, as shown above, has already amounted to $1,935,016, and on the cost basis of the last fiscal year the cost is piling up at the rate of $8,062.50 per day.

As shown from the foregoing table of salvage to the Government from war-time investments, the Ford offer for the nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals will give the Government the highest rate of salvage it will have obtained from either of the war-time expenditures included in that list. The military cantonments, constructed during the war, which have thus far been salvaged have brought practically nothing. Many of them have been completely abandoned and their buildings are going to waste, for the reason that they are not even worth the cost of "scrapping."

When the fact is taken into consideration that Mr. Ford's offer for the nitrate plants imposes upon him the obligation to keep the plants in reserve, at his expense, for the use of the Government in time of war for the production of explosives, his bid looms large in comparison with the prices obtained for the other war-time investments, from which no further returns will be secured. So there has not been and can not be any just criticism of the amount offered by Mr. Ford for the nitrate plants.

Mr. Ford not only offers a very fair price for the nitrate plants, but agrees to keep nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals in an up-to-date running condition and available to the Government without cost if it should ever be needed for military purposes and the manufacture of munitions. It is now in a stand-by condition, expensive to guard and maintain. The older it grows the more expensive the maintenance charges will be. With the very best care it would rust out and greatly deteriorate in value. The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is a comparatively new art, and it will be improved from time to time; and in order for this plant to keep pace with the progress of the art and be an up-to-date going concern in the event of a military emergency, it must be operated in peace times.

Besides, the act of Congress making provision for its construction provided that it should be operated in peace times for the manufacture of fertilizer. So the acceptance of the Ford offer preserves this plant as a military plant and at the same time makes provision for its operation by private capital in peace time for the manufacture of fertilizer. The maintenance of the plant by the Ford company, relieving the Government of all expense and keeping it in an up-to-date running condition, is of inestimable value and would save the Government many millions of dollars, besides the advantages to agriculture, the basic industry, on which the success and prosperity of every other business depends.

Mr. Ford further agrees to operate nitrate plant No. 2 during the entire period of the lease to its full capacity in the manufacture of commercial fertilizer and sell direct to the farmers at a price not to exceed 8 per cent over the actual cost of production, through a board nominated by the farmers' organizations and appointed by the President.

The present capacity of the plant would produce about 2,000,000 tons of fertilizer, which is about 30 per cent of the amount of fertilizer consumed in normal times. It has been clearly shown that with cheap water power the Ford company can make fertilizer at about one-half of the present price. The Nation's fertilizer bill is now nearly $250,000,000 annually. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that the operation of the Muscle Shoals plant should only result in a 20 per cent reduction in prices. That would amount to $50,000,000 a year saving to the farmers, and this amount for 100 years out on compound interest—as the opponents of the Ford offer have undertaken to do in claiming what Mr. Ford would make from the Government in compounding interest—would be over $5,000,000,000 saved to the farmers of the country.

FORD'S OFFER TO LEASE THE DAMS.

Mr. Ford's agreement requires his company to be responsible for the upkeep and repair of the power houses and equipment at his own expense; to pay the Government $55,000 annually for the upkeep of the dams and locks, which will save the Government the expense of maintaining the present imperfect facilities for navigation at Muscle Shoals, amounting to from $35,000 to $85,000 per annum; also to pay as an annual rental 4 per cent on the actual cost of the completion of the dams; and, in addition to all this, create a sinking fund by paying to the Government $46,746 annually, which, if invested by the Government at 4 per cent interest, would amount to $49,071,935 at the end of the lease; if invested at 4½ per cent would amount to $58,570,003.

The Secretary of War, in his report to Congress discussing this part of the Ford offer (House Document 167, p. 7), made the following statement:

Should the dams be constructed at a cost of not to exceed $42,000,000, as estimated by Mr. Ford's engineers, there would be left to apply on the investment of the Government heretofore made whatever the amortization payments would produce in excess of the $42,000,000. If the amortization fund should be invested continuously at 4 per cent there would be at least $7,000,000 to be thus applied, but should it be invested at a greater rate of interest the amount would be increased as shown by the table following.

Amount retired by Mr Ford's sinking fund at various rates of interest, compounded semiannually.

Account of—	Semi-annual pay-ments.	Life of fund (years).	Amount retired at following interest rates.
			4 per cent.	4½ per cent.	4½ per cent.	5 per cent.	6 per cent.
Dam No. 2	$19,868	94	$40,919,798	$48,783,949	$58,319,359	$83,718,097	$176,030,810
Dam No. 3	3,505	97	8,152,137	9,786,054	11,780,690	17,150,545	37,103,880
Total			49,071,935	58,570,003	70,100,049	100,868,642	213,134,690

NOTE.—Payments are to be made into sinking fund semiannually at the beginning of each semiannual interest period. This sinking (or retirement) fund has nothing to do with Mr. Ford's interest payments, but represents a separate fund to be invested at the highest interest rate obtainable for the purpose of returning to the Government within the lease period the largest amount possible, with the above semiannual payments, consistent with safe investment.

The Secretary of War found no fault with this part of the Ford offer, nor do I remember to have heard of any criticism of it by anyone.

A group of powerful interests is flooding Congress and the country with all kinds of propaganda filled with false and misleading statements about Mr. Ford's plans and purposes. One very elaborate publication was issued purporting to tell "The Truth About Muscle Shoals" and a large part of it was an attempt to show that Mr. Ford would devote the Muscle Shoals plant to the manufacture of sulphate of ammonia, and this product would have but little effect upon the cost of fertilizer. Mr. Ford does not intend to produce sulphate of ammonia as a nitrogen fertilizer compound. He will, of course, produce ammonia by the air nitrogen fixation process and mix ammonia with phosphoric acid, produced electrically from phosphate rock obtained near by, thus making ammonia phosphate.

The same publication states the cost of completing Dam No. 2 would be $33,000,000, and of Dam No. 3, $24,000,000, or $57,000,000 for the completion of the dams. The facts are that experienced and responsible contractors have offered to complete Dam No. 2 for $23,000,000, and build Dam No. 3 for $17,000,000, making a total of $40,000,000 for both. The estimate of Mr. Ford's engineers is $42,000,000. The outside estimates of the engineers of the War Department is about $48,000,000, and they admit that it may be considerably less.

Mr. Ford, according to his offer, is to construct the dams under the direction of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department. It will be his interest to do it as cheaply as he can, as he is to pay an annual rental of 4 per cent on what it cost.

Some of those who are opposing the Ford offer have criticized the 4 per cent on what it costs to complete the dams as annual rental for the water power. To show that there is no cause for such criticism I submit the following table of Government loans now outstanding in the shape of bond issues:

		Per cent.
Consuls, 1930	$500,724,050	2
Panamas, 1916–36	48,954,180	2
Panamas, 1918–38	25,947,400	2
Panamas, 1961	50,000,000	3
Postal Savings	11,774,020	2½
Conversion, 1946–47	28,894,500	3
WAR ISSUES.
Liberty, 1932–47	1,410,074,050	3½
Liberty, 1932–47	15,130,900	4
Liberty, 1927–47	66,362,800	4
Victory, 1923	497,915,100	3¾

From the above table it will be seen that bond issues prior to the recent war issues were on a basis of from 2 to 3 per cent, and the average was under 2½ per cent. It also shows that a number of war issues were at 4 per cent and less. It was only toward the end of the war and in the most serious stress of the war that some bonds were issued at a rate of 4¼ to 4¾ per cent.

In normal times our Government bonds have been issued for much less than 4 per cent, so it is fair to assume that the 4 per cent which Mr. Ford is to pay as annual rental for a 100-year period will be above the average rate that will prevail during that time.

When the Ford offer is accepted, Congress, instead of appropriating money from time to time to complete the dams, could provide for the issuance of 4 per cent bonds, which would be easily negotiated. The interest paid by the Ford Co. as rental for the power would pay the interest on the bonds and the amortization plan would liquidate the bonds, and in this way the completion of the dams would not cost the Government anything.

100-YEAR LEASES.

There has been some criticism of that part of the Ford offer which provides for a lease of the water power for 100 years. Practically all of the water-power developments up to this time provide for a 99-year lease period. The criticism of this feature of the offer seems to be due to a provision in the general water power law, approved June 10, 1920, which provides for 50-year leases with rights of renewal.

There should be no objection to the Ford offer on account of the 100-year-lease period; first, for the reason that the dams at Muscle Shoals were approved by the War Department and work commenced on the construction of one of them before the enactment of the general water power law; second, because the development at Muscle Shoals is in a class to itself. There is nothing else like it. Besides, the dams are being built by the Government and will be the property of the Government and not a lessee.

There is a fall of 134 feet in 36½ miles. The flow of the river is 72,000 second-feet at low water and 499,000 second-feet at high water. The Wilson Dam is to be 100 feet high and 4,425 feet long; Dam No. 3, 14 miles up the river, is to be 40 feet high and 6,725 feet in length; the two together developing about 800,000 horsepower, more than has ever been developed at any one place in the world.

There is a present market for only a small part of this power. It will require a number of years to secure a market for it all. Mr. Ford is not willing to take over this water power under a lease for less than 100 years. He claims that on account of the heavy expenses and the time required to provide a use and market for this power that a lease for less than that length of time would be unreasonable. This power site is in a class to itself. It is the greatest water power east of the Mississippi River.

General Beach, Chief of Engineers of the War Department, says that he thought a 100-year lease in this case was proper and reasonable, and gave his reasons. Many others are of the same opinion. The Government and taxpayers are fully protected during the entire period of the lease, so there is no valid objection to the 100-year lease.

The fact that the general water power law provides for a 50-year lease, with rights of renewal, is no reason why this lease should not be for 100 years for the reasons I have stated.

The general water power law, as we all know, was a compromise measure in many respects, and has been very disappointing in results, as there has been but little water-power development since that time. There were great differences of opinion among the Members of both Houses of Congress as to what the lease period should be. A great many favored a 100-year lease period.

GREAT POSSIBILITIES FOR WATER TRANSPORTATION.

The building of these dams as provided in the Ford offer will not only develop this great water power which has been going to waste for all time but will open up cheap water transportation on the upper Tennessee River, which runs through a vast area rich in great deposits of coal, iron ore, marble, slate, phosphate rock, zinc, and immense forests of hardwood timber, all of which is needed in other parts of the country. With this cheap water transportation all these materials which are now locked up for want of transportation facilities can be transported on the Ohio River, thence onto the Mississippi River, and to all the markets, both domestic and foreign.

GOVERNMENT RECLAMATION SERVICE.

I hope that I have shown that the acceptance of the Ford offer will not cost the Government anything in the end. But even if it should lose some interest during the construction period in making provision for the manufacture of a cheaper and high-grade concentrated fertilizer for the farmers in those sections of the country where fertilizer is absolutely necessary, it would not compare with the amounts which have been appropriated by Congress for the reclamation of arid lands in our Western States.

The Government reclamation of the arid West is both a paternal and an internal improvement which is essentially a cooperative arrangement between the Government and private parties. The summary of appropriations made by Congress for western land irrigation to 1915 amounts to $116,824,894.82, and of that amount there was an authorized Government bond issue of $20,000,000, and none of these appropriations in aid of irrigation improvements in the West return any interest payment to the Government.

One of the most prominent examples of the reclamation projects of the West is the case of the Roosevelt Dam, 79 miles northwest of Phoenix, Ariz., this dam being 284 feet high and 235 feet long, originally estimated to cost $5,000,000; but the total cost of this reservoir, dam, power system, diversion works, canals, drilling, and so forth, to July 1, 1913, was $11,193,687. The money was loaned to them to aid in irrigating their lands without interest for at least 20 years, and in some places it goes on into a revolving fund year after year without any interest to the Government.

The Government has very properly assisted and encouraged the western farmers to water their arid lands. For the same reason the Government should at least give Mr. Ford an opportunity to aid the farmers who need fertilizer.

Other countries are using their air nitrogen plants successfully for the manufacture of fertilizer and are making most valuable contributions to agriculture in this way. Our country is making progress along all other lines; why not this?

CHILEAN NITRATE AND FERTILIZER TRUSTS AND OTHER SELFISH INTERESTS OPPOSE THE FORD OFFER.

What is the cause of this opposition? It has been conclusively shown during this hearing that the Ford Co. would produce fertilizer by reason of the cheap water power and the Ford Co.'s business methods at from one-third to one-half cheaper than the present prices of fertilizer.

I believe that everyone who has studied the question will agree that Dr. Milton Whitney, Chief of the Bureau of Soils, and an expert on matters pertaining to fertilizer, was right when he said that the present policy pertaining to the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer was wrong and should be remedied.

I have no doubt but that the manufacture of fertilizer by the Ford Co. at Muscle Shoals would revolutionize the fertilizer business in this country by reason of the quality and price of the fertilizer produced.

When the war ended it was costing the Government $1,000,000 an hour. One reason was that those who sold us nitrates and explosives of different kinds charged any price they pleased while our boys were fighting and dying in the trenches in France. We were helpless—had to get our nitrates from Chile.

We are dependent upon Chilean nitrate for nitrogen for war and fertilizer purposes. We have paid out for Chilean nitrate since 1867 the enormous sum of $821,183,624.12. In addition to this large sum the people of the United States, principally the farmers, have paid to Chile an export duty of $11.87 per ton on Chilean nitrates, which has amounted to $163,647,780.63 since 1867.

Why should the farmers of the United States continue to pay tribute to a foreign country to secure nitrogen for fertilizer purposes when there is over 21,000,000 tons of nitrogen in the air over every square mile, when we have one of the largest and best nitrogen plants in the world, equipped and planned to take the nitrogen from the air and convert it into a solid substance by means of the patented process for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and thereby lower the prices and keep our money at home? We not only pay a high price for the Chilean nitrate and an export tax, but high ocean freight rates for four or five thousand miles to the nearest American port, and then high railroad freight rates to the station nearest to the farmer, then usually a long-distance haul over muddy roads to the farm where it is to be used. After all of this expense, it contains only about 16 per cent of nitrogen; the balance is of no value as a plant food and is what is usually called filler. Mr. Ford proposes to make a concentrated fertilizer and sell it to the farmer and let him do the mixing if he desires and save all this expense.

The American representative of the Chilean Nitrate Corporation testified before the Graham Committee on War Expenditures that the price of Chilean nitrate, or nitrate of soda, as it is commonly called, was fixed by the Chilean Nitrate Commission in London. He also stated that the by-product coke-oven companies in the United States placed the same price on their ammonium sulphate in proportion to nitrogen content. He further stated that, in his opinion, if the Muscle Shoals plant should be operated for the manufacture of fertilizer that the Chilean Nitrate Corporation would have to sell Chilean nitrate at the same price that it would be sold for at Muscle Shoals. So it is easy to understand why the Chilean Nitrate Corporation should oppose the Ford offer. It has no competition at this time and is interested in keeping down competition.

The acceptance of the Ford offer will make us independent of this foreign power both for fertilizer and war purposes. The quality of fertilizer we are now using is inferior, and the prices prohibitive in proportion to the present prices of farm products. We have been diligent in our effort to enact legislation in the interest of the farmers; we have secured large amounts of national aid to rural roads; we have provided a system of farm loan banks for the purpose of enabling the farmers to secure long-time loans at a low rate of interest; we have revived the activities of the War Finance Corporation in order to assist the farmers in marketing their crops; we have recently enacted a cooperative marketing bill. We now have an opportunity to do something further by accepting the Ford offer and protecting the American farmer from further imposition by these foreign and domestic monopolies who fix and manipulate the prices of fertilizer at their will without any regard to the price of farm products or the financial ability of the American farmer.

There are 6,500,000 farmers in the United States. Thirty-eight per cent of our population live on farms. The annual value of crops and live stock amount to from eleven to twenty-five billion dollars. Agriculture has an investment of $80,000,000,000, the largest investment by far of any other business. The next largest business is railroads, with an investment of $20,000,000,000.

The shrinkage in value of the crops of 1920 amounted to $8,000,000,000, from which the farmers have not yet recovered. In the face of this condition of the American farmer the price of Chilean nitrate has advanced $17 per ton since January 1. The fertilizer known as 8-3-3 has advanced from $26 a ton to $31 a ton.

The National Fertilizer Association opposes the Ford offer. It has flooded Members of Congress with literature in which it is contended, first, that the Ford Co. can not make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals, and second, that it can not make it cheaper than it is now being sold. If this be true, why should they be so concerned about the Ford offer? It is very apparent that they believe that Ford can make fertilizer cheaper, and that it will materially affect their business. This same representative of the National Fertilizer Association contended before the Military Committee of the House that a monopoly of water-power interests was in the interest of the people.

EARLY ACTION IS NECESSARY IN ORDER TO GIVE EMPLOYMENT TO LABOR ON LARGE SCALE.

Mr. Ford intends, if his offer is accepted, to begin work immediately and give employment to thousands of people who are now unable to secure employment. He claims that the development of his company will eventually result in giving employment to 1,000,000 people. This, with an average of five to the family, would mean 5,000,000 people employed and supported as a direct result of this development.

Can anyone doubt for a moment that Mr. Ford, with his immense capital, organization, and wonderful record of efficiency, will not make a success of this undertaking? Would not the American people regard it as a national calamity to reject the Ford offer and prevent this development, which would be nation-wide in its beneficial effects?

The acceptance of the Ford offer would not only result in giving employment to labor on a large scale, provide for better and cheaper fertilizer, and improvement to navigation, but that part of the country within a radius of 200 miles, and probably more, and all intervening points would be supplied with cheap power for all purposes.

It also means the investment by the Ford Co. of forty or fifty million dollars in equipping the nitrate plant for the manufacture of fertilizer and the establishment of other industrial plants.

THOMAS A. EDISON SAYS THE DETROIT MANUFACTURER WOULD MAKE A GREAT SUCCESS WITH HIS PLANS AT MUSCLE SHOALS.

It is claimed by some that Mr. Ford can not make a success of the fertilizer business at Muscle Shoals. Mr. Thomas A. Edison, after visiting Muscle Shoals and making full investigation, said he considered that it was a practical thing to make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals; that there is nothing complex about it. Is not his opinion worth something?

Many said that Mr. Ford could not make cheap automobiles, trucks, and tractors in competition with those engaged in the business when he commenced, but in this they were mistaken. Last year the Ford Co. turned out 1,013,958 passenger automobiles and trucks, and is now selling an automobile, a tractor, and a truck for $1,150, and claims that he will be able to reduce it to $1,000 if his offer for Muscle Shoals is accepted.

The success of Henry Ford is the marvel of the century when we realize what he has accomplished was in spite of the powerful opposition, fighting a single-handed battle. The great masses of the people of the Nation not only indorse his offer but have implicit faith in his ability to carry out the big plans he has in view if he gets Muscle Shoals.

One of the chief causes of his success is because he is willing to help his fellow man. No one ever hears of friction between capital and labor in the great manufacturing plants of the Ford Motor Co.

Henry Ford believes in high wages and low price of product. On that basis he has been a wonderful success. In this respect he is very different to many of the leaders of financial power in this country.

FORD OFFER INDORSED BY ALL FARM ORGANIZATIONS AND FARM PAPERS.

The Ford offer has the hearty and unanimous indorsement of every farm organization and farm newspaper in this country. The representatives of these farm organizations have visited Muscle Shoals several times and made a thorough investigation of its possibilities from a fertilizer standpoint and have been unanimous in their report and recommendations in favor of the completion of the development and the operation of the plants. They regard the acceptance of the Ford offer as the only hope of relief from the Chilean nitrate and fertilizer monopolies and trusts. The farmers of this country are watching closely the action of Congress in the matter of the Ford offer and will not be satisfied unless this is done. They are intelligent and fully understand the Ford offer, and are confident that if it is accepted that the Ford company will revolutionize the fertilizer industry, destroy the monopoly, and give them cheaper and better fertilizer.

The Ford offer has the unqualified indorsement of the Mississippi Valley Association, an organization composed of strong and successful business men covering a territory representing 55 per cent of the population of the United States.

INDORSED BY WASHINGTON FARMERS' CONFERENCE.

The Ford offer was unanimously indorsed by the great farmers' conference, which was called by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, at the request of President Harding, which was in session in the city of Washington for five days the latter part of January of this year. During the discussion of the Ford offer in that conference only one voice was raised against it, and that was by an official of the American Fertilizer Association.

President Harding, in addressing the Washington Conference of Farmers, among other things, made the following significant statement:

> Waterways have been too long neglected in America. We need a practical development of water resources, both for transportation and power. A large share of the railroad tonnage is coal for railway fuel. The experiences of railway electrification demonstrate the possibility of reducing this vast and increasing efficiency. We may begin very soon to consider plans to electrify our railroads.

Soon after this address was delivered by President Harding, Mr. Mapothier, president of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, one of the great railway systems of the country, announced in a speech in Birmingham, Ala., that he was in favor of the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals, and if it was accepted by Congress his company would like to make a trial of electricity in railroad operation on its branch line from Muscle Shoals to Nashville, Tenn., a distance of about 150 miles.

The 800,000 horsepower developed at Muscle Shoals would conserve 6,500,000 tons of coal annually; that is, the water power would be equal to the power generated by the use of that much coal.

So when the water power is developed in accordance with the Ford offer, it will also mean a conservation of coal on a big scale.

Business, civic, and commercial organizations in all parts of the country have passed resolutions urging Congress to accept the Ford offer. I do not recall anything that has ever heretofore attracted such a nation-wide interest and favorable indorsement. Not only farmers but merchants, bankers, and professional men have made known to Members of Congress their approval of the Ford offer and their desire that it be accepted. This sentiment for the Ford offer has been demonstrated by the people in all parts of the country by means of petitions, resolutions of mass meetings, women's clubs, leagues of women voters, posts of the American Legion, labor organizations, and civic organizations of all kinds urging Congress to adopt the Ford offer.

The Alabama delegation in Congress is as a unit in favor of the Ford offer, and will continue to work together very earnestly to have it accepted by Congress. The delegation is equally as strong and united in its opposition to the offer of the Alabama Power Co. and its efforts to defeat the Ford offer. However, the offer of the Alabama Power Co. has been unanimously rejected by the Military Committee of the House, to which it was referred.

The delegations from a number of other States have also indorsed the Ford offer.

I am heartily in favor of the acceptance of the last and final offer of Henry Ford, made on the 31st day of May, 1922, which includes the Gorgas steam plant.

IF THE FORD OFFER IS NOT APPROVED, WHAT WILL THE COMMITTEE RECOMMEND?

It would seem that there is but one of three courses for Congress to follow, viz:

1. That of scrapping the development, which has cost over $100,000,000, as has been suggested by the big interests opposing the Ford offer; or

2. For the Government to complete the water-power development and go into the business of selling power and manufacturing and selling fertilizer; or

3. Accept the Ford offer and convert a large war-time expenditure into an investment which will result in a great benefit to the entire country.

It would be almost unthinkable to consider the first; the second would be very objectionable to the great majority of people; the third is the only safe and sensible course to pursue and would meet with the approval of the country at large.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ALMON. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. HILL. I make the same request.

Mr. JAMES. I make the same request.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I make the same request.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that all gentlemen who desire to extend their remarks on the subject under debate may have that privilege for five legislative days.

Mr. MANN. Five legislative days—better make it calendar days.

Mr. ANTHONY. Five calendar days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to making it 15 calendar days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extensions of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the appropriation for Muscle Shoals. It is very pleasing to us who have been the friends of this project from the beginning to see the change of sentiment in favor of it, and let us hope that we will soon have the opportunity of deciding whether or not we shall adopt a comprehensive policy giving the people of the country the benefit that we see in it or whether we shall let it go to waste.

Reduced to its last analysis, the development of Muscle Shoals means cheaper fertilizer for the farmers of the United States in time of peace and a munition plant removed from attack from the sea in case of emergency.

When we asked for this appropriation about a year ago we were told from the floor of the House that it was extravagance. But to-day many who criticized it then have come to understand that the development of this plant will prove to be a great economy and benefit to the people of the United States. After long consideration of the Muscle Shoals development problem, the House committee having charge of this measure have filed several reports. Certainly Congress ought to give us the right of way for the consideration of this measure. The House committee admits that the only pending development program worth consideration is that submitted by Mr. Ford, which already has the popular indorsement in so far as that indorsement can be given by favorable resolutions and mass meetings of commercial bodies. In other words, the people of this country are demanding that Mr. Ford be given the opportunity to develop it. They feel that no measure we could enact could do more to help preserve the fertility of the soil and build up the country than this one. It is a question that we should solve as a great American question without regard to partisanship. I repeat, we are glad to get this appropriation to continue the work, but we hope that we will soon be given an opportunity to decide upon a comprehensive plan, and that when we reach that time that the Ford proposition be accepted.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this amendment (Huddleston amendment); and should it be voted down I shall vote for the James amendment. I prefer the first, for the reason that it makes the appropriation unavailable in the event the Ford offer is accepted by the Congress. I entertain the belief that the appropriation of $7,500,000, carried by the Senate amendment, to empower the Government to renew the work at Muscle Shoals and the undertaking by the Government of the completion of the dam is simply a covert effort to defeat the Ford offer. It is indeed singularly strange that the opponents of Ford in this House should now be enthusiastic advocates of a resumption by the Government of the work at Muscle Shoals, when less than two years ago they were opposed to the continuation and completion of that enterprise and defeated a bill carrying an appropriation of $10,000,000 for that purpose.

These same gentlemen at that time wanted to junk the whole project. This change of heart and of front on their part indicates very strongly that the scheme of the enemies of Ford is to serve the interests of the Alabama Power Co., the Fertilizer Trust, and other moneyed interests to the detriment of the farmers of the country by placing every obstacle possible in Ford's way, and to delay as long as possible the consideration of the bill carrying his offer, with the hope that he may withdraw it or that a public sentiment may be built up by untruthful propaganda which will, in a measure, excuse or justify the Congress in working out the scheme of having the Government enter upon the manufacture of nitrates to be used for fertilizer purposes.

A no more pleasing plan to the Fertilizer Trust could be devised. To have their friends and the friends of the hydroelectric companies operating, in the name of the Government, a fertilizer and electric plant at Muscle Shoals would be all they could ask for or could wish. Those concerns know that all competition under Government operation would be gone. In fact, it would never have a beginning. They also know that such an operation would result in failure and that ultimately they could acquire the property at their own figures. Furthermore, they know that the Government would be years in completing the dam resulting in the installation of new machinery for the manufacture of nitrates, all conducive of the promotion of the interest of the power companies and the Fertilizer Trust and promotive of the dwarfing and strangling to death of the enterprise, which if operated by Ford will grow and prosper, bringing manifold blessings to the agricultural interests throughout the entire country, giving to the farmers cheaper fertilizers, the industrial enterprises cheaper power, and to the laboring man employment and better living conditions.

All these things are greatly desired. They bring prosperity and contentment to the people of the Nation, and, to some degree, fulfill the purposes for which this Government was organized.

They tend to promote the general welfare and insure domestic tranquillity—one of the purposes sought to be accomplished in the ordination of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. To permit the appropriation carried by the Senate amendment to this bill to become available immediately upon the passage of the bill means the administration of the funds by a hand unfriendly to Ford; to put in his hands a powerful weapon to be used in the defeat of the efforts of Ford and his friends to create conditions promotive of the building of an industrial city, the stimulation of the production of farm products, and the prosperity of the people of the entire Nation.

It would indeed be a calamity to permit Ford's enemies to prevent him from acquiring Muscle Shoals by an apparently fair proposition, but which is, in truth and in fact, an insidious and underhand attack, having for its purpose the defeat of his plans, which contemplate giving to the people of this country a development promotive of their prosperity never before, in their history, dreamed of. It would be more than unfortunate to permit the Alabama Power Co. and its allies to get control of this, one of the greatest water powers of the Nation; and in my humble judgment the attempt to make the appropriation carried by the Senate amendment is a scheme, subtle and covert, to accomplish that result.

The Alabama Power Co. is entitled to no consideration at the hands of this Congress. It once betrayed the trust committed to it by this Government. It undertook and did construct on a fee basis the Gorgas plant, for which it received the munificent sum of $225,000. It constructed that plant for the Government upon its own land and so connected it with its own plant as to render separation of the two practically impossible without serious injury and damage to both. In doing so it violated one of the plain provisions of the statute enacted by this Congress. It did more than this, if that were possible. It took advantage of the emergency conditions created by the war to incorporate into the contract under which it constructed the Gorgas plant the right to purchase from the Government that plant at a price to be fixed by certain designated persons, again violating the statutes.

It was not until some time after the Ford offer was made known and, indeed, not until the Military Affairs Committee of this House began its investigation of the merits of the Ford offer that the Alabama Power Co. made known that it would insist upon its rights under the illegal and unconscionable contract obtained from a representative of this Government under circumstances of which no just man would take advantage. And this is the situation and attitude of the corporation now seeking to acquire control of the Muscle Shoals property to perpetuate its greedy monopoly of the most valuable asset that the State of Alabama has and to defeat a development that will be of incalculable benefit to the people of this country, especially the farmers. With such a course of dealing, involving the betrayal of the trust and confidence reposed under circumstances produced by war conditions and at a time when loyalty to America and American ideals should prevail, I insist that that concern is entitled only to such consideration as is usually awarded to those who prostitute, to their selfish ends, the functions of a Government established by the people and for the people, and that it has merited the righteous condemnation of the people whom it seeks to oppress.

Whether Ford is successful in the acceptance of his offer by the Congress, his proposal has accomplished the result of giving an impetus and creating a quickening of interest in water-power development throughout this country which will be of incalculable value to the entire Nation. His offer has developed an appreciation of the enormous values of the Tennessee River for transportation and hydroelectric purposes. It has pointed the way for cheaper fertilizers, cheaper transportation, and cheaper power for industrial enterprises.

It has awakened in Congress an appreciation of the illimitable potentialities of the Tennessee River, of other undeveloped water powers, and of their inestimable value to the people of this country. He has brought a realization to the farmers of this country that, in the development of water powers used for the production of nitrates, fertilizers may be manufactured at reasonable cost, and that they may be bought in the markets of the country at a price that will justify their use by landowners in the building up and the making of their lands more productive of crops. His offer has brought a realization to the consumers of farm products that the cost of those products can be lessened with a profit to the farmer who raises them. His offer has brought a realization to the industrial world, that by the use of the water powers of the country hydroelectricity may be made to take the place of coal and other fuel now used to produce power necessary to the operation of industrial plants. His offer has brought to the workingman an appreciation and a realization that the development of water power is capable of productive power for enterprises at a cost which will enable those enterprises to give employment at good wages and to maintain living conditions conducive to contentment and loyalty to American institutions.

CONFERENCE REPORT—NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report for printing under the rule on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on this side?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I realize that there are many gentlemen here who are desirous of debating this question, and hence I shall not consume but a short time in summing up the facts that lead me to believe that the completion of this project is not only meritorious but an imperative national necessity. The human mind revolts at the thought of war, and especially since we see upon every hand the cold and cruel evidence of its brutality, as indicated by the thousands and tens of thousands of brave and patriotic American boys whose fortunes have been blighted and whose lives have been rendered dark and desolate and despondent as a result of their glorious service in the recent world conflict. Our fervent prayer to God Almighty is that war shall be no more, but as worthy sires of them that are to follow in our footsteps let us not forget that a nation, no less than the individual, which fails to provide for its own household has renounced the faith of the founding fathers, and its inevitable doom is death.

The pitiful plight in which we found ourselves as a Nation when war was declared against the Imperial Government of Germany, and the consequential loss of human life and the wealth of the Nation as a result of our unpreparedness for war, should be a sufficient warning to us and to our posterity. I have no doubt but that there are in the silent cemeteries of France to-day hundreds, yea, thousands of newly-made sepulchres, in which rests the immortal dust of American men that would not have been there had we been prepared to furnish them the necessary equipment with which to meet the foe.

Millions, yea, billions of dollars, in addition to the lives of our courageous men, was the price and penalty imposed upon America in the mad rush for preparedness after war had been declared. Much of these billions of debt we must, in shame, confess was imposed through lack of the exercise of proper business management, and millions of it was simply stolen through graft made possible by the cost plus 10 per cent plan of construction. The air-nitrogen plant at Muscle Shoals cost in the neighborhood of $70,000,000, and little does it matter now how economically or how extravagantly it was constructed, it is sufficient, and I think proper to say, that this plant is not only the largest but the greatest air-nitrogen plant in all the world. In times of war it is indispensable, and in times of peace can be utilized, in conjunction with the power developed through the completion of the immense dam upon which we have already spent $17,000,000, in the manufacture of nitrates of ammonia for the benefit of the farmers of the United States.

Its completion and usage in the manufacture of fertilizer in times of peace promises not only a benefit to the farmers but the Nation as well. No nation can enjoy the zenith of its prosperity, if indeed it can enjoy a limited degree, without first giving prosperity to that great and important industry known as agriculture. Agriculture can not remain prosperous indefinitely without replenishing the soil with elements essential to productivity, nor can it thrive and prosper unless these elements can be supplied to the farmer at a reasonable cost. The Nation can not long survive unless the soil from which the staff of life must come is replenished and kept in the highest state of productivity. In all the history of the world no Nation has yet fallen except it be as a result of military defeat or the exhaustion of the fertility of the soil. Assyria and Babylon and other great nations of Biblical times, supporting millions of people, raising great armies in Persia that came across into parts of Europe, are to-day desert wastes where crops will not grow, and they were destroyed fundamentally because of the destruction of their soil fertility. This Nation, confronted as it is with an ever-increasing population, with full possession of the facts leading to the downfall of empires in the past, cognizant, as we must be, of the ever-increasing drift of our population away from the farm to the city, must open its eyes and accept the golden opportunities fixed by the hand of Divine Providence in the powerful possibilities that await development on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals.

Let us come now to a consideration of what is the best thing to do with this immense project to insure the greatest good to the greatest number of our people. I should never approve the losing control by the Government of the nitrate plants in case of a national emergency, no more than would I approve the operation of this plant by the Government for the purpose of developing power for commercial purposes, for I do not believe in the doctrine of Government ownership and operation of public utilities, and if I had ever been guilty of approving such a doctrine I would want to wash my hands and turn my back upon its memory after seeing the miserable mess coming out of governmental control during the war. I believe in the individual initiative necessary to the successful operation of any business, and therefore I believe in the offer made by Mr. Ford for the lease of this property, and hope that in due time it will be accepted.

We should not, nor do the people expect, that we go blindly into the making of a contract relating to this very valuable property. The Committee on Military Affairs, while not in accord in their views as to the disposition of this property, are, nevertheless, to be congratulated for the intelligent and comprehensive manner in which they have conducted the hearings. By the fruits of their labor, extending over a period of months, we have before us every fact necessary to an intelligent consideration and determination of the question of its disposition. At no time has there been the slightest intimation of partisan politics entering into it. In fact, every member of that committee has sought diligently to reach the merits, and as a result of their painstaking efforts the offer of Mr. Ford has been so modified from time to time as I deem it to be now entirely acceptable to the majority of this House as well as to the millions of farmers throughout the country.

The advantages of the Ford proposal may be briefly summarized in this way:

First. It removes the objection against Government operation.

Second. Protects in full the Government's war-time interest in the nitrate plant, since he agrees to maintain it in its present state of readiness for the manufacture of explosives, thereby relieving the Government of the expense incident to guarding, maintaining, and keeping up the depreciation charges, which, in round numbers, would amount to $400,000 annually.

Third. Provides slack-water navigation when the dams are completed over the entire Muscle Shoals obstruction, which is at present the greatest single obstruction to the complete navigation of the Tennessee River. The expense to which the Government would have to go in order to complete this project for navigation purposes alone is estimated at $8,000,000.

Fourth. Develops one of the greatest water-power projects in the world, producing far more power than the Niagara Falls.

Fifth. Proposes, at his individual expense, to construct dams on the several rivers flowing into the Tennessee above Muscle Shoals in order to develop storage reservoirs sufficient to increase the flow at Muscle Shoals during the dry season of the year and thereby stabilize the power development to the maximum throughout the entire year.

Sixth. The Ford proposal provides the fullest operation of the fertilizer feature; provides for the research into the discovery of new processes, and their commercial use when demonstrated, and it is but reasonable to expect from such a development that the cost of fertilizer to the farmer will be cut in half. In other words, it would save the farmer at present rates of consumption $100,000,000 annually on his fertilizer bill and at the same time provide a lower cost factor in the production of food and clothing.

Seventh. It is further proposed by Mr. Ford that he take over the completion of the Wilson Dam and also complete Dam No. 3, which is 17 miles up the river, at cost and without profit, and will pay to the Government 4 per cent interest on whatever amount thus spent, and also provides an amortization fund which will return the expended amount to the Government, together with the property itself at the end of the lease.

What more could we ask than what he has offered? What more could he do than he has offered to do?

Let us therefore make the appropriation as provided in the Senate amendment of $7,500,000, contingent upon and with the hope that before October 1, 1922, we shall have had the time and opportunity to consider and pass upon the Ford offer, favorably, I trust, with the assurance that, when completed, our safety, our peace, our progress, our prosperity, and our happiness as a Nation have been made secure. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would not represent the people who honored me with a seat in this Chamber should I fail to exert every honorable means for the early acceptance of the Ford offer for the development of Muscle Shoals. [Applause.]

The people of Tennessee believe, and I think rightly so, that the Ford proposal is the only proposition thus far made that is worthy of the dignity of congressional consideration. They have implicit faith in Henry Ford's initiative and business ability. They believe he possesses the genius and vision to realize those ideals which prompted him to propose such a stupendous industrial undertaking. I have observed his matchless and startling success in the industrial world with no little interest. His unparalleled record as a financier justifies the confidence of the country in his ability to get results. It was Henry Ford who first focused the attention of the public on the great possibilities of Muscle Shoals. He said of Muscle Shoals, "Let me have it, and I will make it a wonderful development, something that will open the eyes of the world." Thomas A. Edison, the greatest inventive genius of all ages, after making a personal visit to Muscle Shoals, said, "You ask me the possibilities of Muscle Shoals. I can not tell you; they are so great." Numerous authorities and experts of both national and international prominence have registered their faith in the possibilities of this gigantic water-power site, one of the world's greatest gifts of nature.

Mr. Speaker, my time is too limited to permit a discussion at length of the detailed significance of the Ford offer, and other gentlemen are anxious to be heard. However, at a later date I expect to have more to say, calling the attention of the Congress and the country to what I believe to be a logical and compelling reason why Congress can not afford to refuse to accept the Ford offer.

To me it is most gratifying to note the interest Congress is manifesting in the continued construction of Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals. This is a wise policy and warrants the approval of the country. I was especially delighted to hear the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] say that recent investigations of Muscle Shoals by certain Members of Congress have convinced many who have heretofore been opposed to additional expenditures by the Government, and that they now believe that construction should be resumed and that Muscle Shoals is indeed one of the Nation's greatest assets.

Mr. Speaker, Muscle Shoals is a national asset, and the question of its development is a national problem; one in which every citizen, be he farmer, merchant, manufacturer, or engaged in any other vocation, should be vitally and sincerely concerned.

Military experts of the country declare that Muscle Shoals adequately developed and scientifically operated would be the Gibraltar of our national defense in time of hostilities. Despite our hope for an ever-enduring and unending peace between our country and the nations of the world let us not be so foolish as to believe that wars will be no more. The recent World War revolutionized both offensive and defensive military operations. It was from the airplane came the most dangerous and disastrous weapon of the foe. Hereafter the nation which holds the supremacy of air will be most able to defend its shores from the invading enemy. With Muscle Shoals completed and in operation it can be immediately converted from a commercial industrial plant into the most powerful munition plant in the world, especially provided with facilities for the manufacture of chemical processes so essential for high explosives.

Do not misconstrue me; I am not a militarist; I would that war would never be again. I only make mention of these facts hoping to impress Congress and the country with the magnitude of the hidden resources of Muscle Shoals. I am not only concerned in the development of Muscle Shoals as an arsenal in time of war but I am more concerned in Muscle Shoals being made a national asset in time of peace. I fervently hope that it may never become necessary to appropriate the facilities of this great enterprise for the manufacture of munitions of war. Mr. Speaker, the impelling reason that prompts me to urge the acceptance of the Ford offer and the early completion of Muscle Shoals is the probable service that can be rendered the great agricultural interests of the country in time of peace.

Recognized authorities, worthy of the confidence of the public, insist that the cheap water power that can be obtained at Muscle Shoals, surrounded as it is by inexhaustible minerals, will make it possible for fertilizers to be manufactured from 25 to 50 per cent less than it can now be purchased. If this contention is correct, and it must be admitted that it has not been successfully refuted even by the most skillful opponent of the Ford proposal, it is the plain duty of Congress to promptly provide this enormous saving for the farmers of the Nation. Other industries are demanding and receiving legislative protection at the hands of Congress, and it has been my privilege and pleasure to support such legislation in many instances. It has also been my pleasure to support in every instance legislation which had for its purpose the promotion of the interest of the farmer. But, Mr. Speaker, I can not refrain from insisting that one of the greatest blessings to the agricultural interests of the country would, in my judgment, be the early completion and operation of Muscle Shoals.

Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly support this $7,500,000 appropriation for the continued construction of Dam No. 2. However, I expect to support the James amendment, hoping that Congress may take some action on the Ford offer before October 1 of this year. Personally I would prefer that construction begin on Dam No. 2 at once, due to the unemployment situation in that section. But the friends of the Ford offer are anxious for the House to act on the committee's report before construction is resumed, and being an enthusiastic supporter of the Ford offer and anxious to expedite its early acceptance I gladly join with those in the policies they think best to pursue.

Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the merits of this important question should not be tainted with politics or influenced by sectional prejudices. I sincerely hope that an opportunity will be presented for the consideration of the committee's report. I want to indorse what the able ranking member of the Military Affairs Committee, Mr. MCKENZIE, of Illinois, said. This Congress is capable of determining this proposition, and it is both legally and morally obligated to perform this duty.

Government ownership and operation of Muscle Shoals would be a departure from the fundamental principles of our industrial, national, time-honored policies. The huge and horrifying losses incurred by the railroad under Government control during the World War are too recent and appalling for this Congress to be so unwise as to again attempt a similar experiment.

Mr. Speaker, Muscle Shoals' magnificent water power not only can be used for the manufacture of cheap fertilizer, saving millions annually to a splendid and patriotic class of citizens, but it will generate electricity which can be used by the surrounding cities hundreds of miles away, thereby stimulating industry, giving employment to thousands of citizens, making happy and prosperous a great and grateful people. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have been very much amused all day listening to the attitude of gentlemen on that side of the House. Last year the Committee on Appropriations was unfriendly to the appropriation for which you then clamored. This year the Committee on Appropriations is friendly to the appropriation which you then clamored for, but which you now refuse. It is rather singular—I can not understand it—that you now insist on talking about a proposal which is not before the House. You say that if we give you the $7,500,000 to carry on the work to complete the dams at Muscle Shoals we will destroy the opportunity for future development. How inconsistent you are! Here is an opportunity to begin a work which will be carried on to completion in the long run. Does anyone deny that if we have a completed project we will be able to sell it for more money than if we have an uncompleted project? We have nothing to sell to-day except a prospect. We propose to have something to sell. It is the business of the Government to get all it can out of what it owns. There is no reason why we should not do so, but you come here and ask us to vote for a proposal that no one knows anything about. We propose to give $7,500,000 now toward the completion of that great work. Let us assume that Henry Ford gets the contract. Does anyone deny if he does we will still be compelled to appropriate money? Henry Ford does not propose to invest money in the completion of this work. He wants the Government to do that. The Committee on Appropriations comes to you with a proposal to invest this money for the completion of the work under the direction of its own engineers and you decline it.

You say the appropriation must not be made or, if made, it must not be made available. How inconsistent that is. The Secretary of War says that we ought to go forward with the work. He recommends the appropriation of $7,500,000. He says that we can spend $7,500,000 a year economically, and that we can at this rate of expenditure complete the work in a reasonable time. Does anyone deny the ability of the Army engineers to supervise the completion of this work or the expenditure of this money? I want to appeal to the men here to vote the $7,500,000 recommended by the Committee on Appropriations without restrictions, and then later on, if you have any proposal that means a contract with anybody—Ford or anybody else—bring it forward, and let us consider it on its merits and not become compelled to consider a proposition hogtied by conditions placed on appropriations.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We would be very glad to have the proposition brought forward now for consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows better than anybody in the House, from his own legislative experience, that it is not possible in the present legislative condition in the House to do so.

Mr. MANN. If the House should pass the bill now, it would not hasten the final completion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would indicate the policy of the House.

Mr. MANN. But it would not hasten the event.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] to concur with a substitute amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 132, not voting 180, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JAMES was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

Until further notice:

Mr. Knight with Mr. Ward of North Carolina.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. MANN. How about the motion to concur with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment was included in the gentleman's motion. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 230: Page 147, after the figures "$226,000" in line 16, strike out "Provided, That moneys allotted to the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers by the Veterans' Bureau for support, maintenance, and care of World War veterans shall not be used to augment the appropriations made herein under the heads of 'Current expenses,' 'Repairs,' and 'Farm.'"

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 230 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Restore the matter stricken out of said amendment amended so as to read—

"For the fiscal year 1924, and annually thereafter, moneys allotted to the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers by the Veterans' Bureau for the support, maintenance, and care of World War veterans shall not be used to augment the appropriations made for the support of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

"The provision in this act that 'the Governor of the Panama Canal, so far as the expenditures of appropriations contained in this act may be under his direction, shall, when it is more economical, purchase needed materials, supplies, and equipment from available surplus or reserve stock of the War Department,' shall not apply as to reserve stocks when purchases are made for the Panama Canal proper."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There seems to be a provision here for expenses for 1924.

Mr. ANTHONY. The appropriations for soldiers' homes are now considerably augmented by money received from the Veterans' Bureau for the care of veterans, and they can use those moneys for the support of the homes in addition to those that we appropriate in this bill. Congress now has no control whatever over those specific appropriations, augmented as they are by these large amounts from the Veterans' Bureau. So we provide that next year these appropriations for the support of the homes must stand on their own bottom, and that Congress must appropriate the entire amount of money necessary for their conduct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is a provision in the Constitution about not making appropriations for the Army for more than two years.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman I do not think that will interfere with that; it provides that for the next fiscal year Congress makes the entire appropriation; and it will force an estimate for the entire appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were 200 ayes and 30 noes.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members are present; the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEDMAN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. REED of West Virginia, for 10 days, on account of sickness in his family.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, June 25, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. CURRY as Speaker pro tempore.

Rev. Page Milburn, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thy presence, almighty, everlasting, all-knowing, and all-loving God, worshipping Thee with our hearts, our lips, and our lives. We thank Thee for those who laid the foundations of our Government, pledging their lives, their property, and their sacred honor. We thank Thee for those who have built upon those foundations. Some are living to-day, still devoted to the service of country and of people. Some have passed away, leaving their work behind them. In memory of them we meet to-day. May we be as patriotic, as thoroughgoing, as true, as strong, as active as they, and may the days that are to come see the faith and glory of God, and the progress of this Nation in all good things. Bless those who sit in loneliness and sadness to-day. Keep us day by day by Thy grace and power. Help us to be true men, in courage living lives of honor, truth, and purity, and at last in heaven save each and every one of us with an everlasting salvation. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be deferred until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection it will be so ordered. The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELSTON.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday June 25, 1922, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN A. ELSTON, late a Representative from the sixth district of the State of California.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California offers the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 382.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, late a Member of this House from the State of California.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, Hon. JULIUS KAHN, of California, who is absent from the city, has prepared and sent to me an address which he would deliver if he were present. I ask unanimous consent that it be read by the Clerk and printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read the address of Mr. KAHN.

The Clerk read the address of Mr. KAHN, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to the memory of JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON is a sad privilege, but not a difficult task. There is so much to be said in praise of him that choice of matter taxes judgment. If I were to search out, however, the outstanding characteristic of our departed friend's nature, I would emphasize his kindliness. This beautiful quality enveloped him as a mantle and was sufficiently ample to embrace mankind. His was always the open heart and the open hand, and both showered lavishly their gifts upon all that stood in need.

"For his bounty,
There was no winter in't;
An autumn 'twas that grew the more by reaping.

"This disposition was an attribute that marked his course not only in the close realm of the family or in the larger circle of friends; it found an outlet also in the wider sphere of public activities. He was a philanthropist in the best sense of that somewhat overworked and much-abused term, for his interest in betterment of every kind extended not merely to individuals but to communities and to the future of his beloved native State. It showed itself, as an outstanding example, in his solicitude for the conservation of national parks. He labored earnestly and unceasingly for the improvement and the maintenance of those wonderful monuments of nature—the Yosemite and Sequoia National Parks. Those great spaces, a never-failing delight to the traveler, owe much to his watchful care and intelligent labor.

"Mr. ELSTON was in his best years when the grim reaper overtook him. He had graduated with honors from the University of California, and almost immediately acquired an extensive and lucrative legal practice. He was an exceptionally fine student, delving deeply in every subject that engaged his attention.

"In his public career we see him as executive secretary to the Governor of California; as a member of the board of trustees of the State institution for the deaf and blind; as a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution; and, finally, as a Representative in Congress. He served on a number of committees during his seven years as a Member of this House, and wherever he was placed his painstaking diligence, excellent judgment, and fine legal mind made him eminently useful.

"The review of his public labors, however, has been performed so fully by others, Mr. Speaker, that I shall content myself with but a few more words touching the pleasing personality of our friend and colleague.

"His heart was one of those which most enamor us—
Wax to receive, and marble to retain.

"His generosity was boundless, limited only by his means. The necessities of others were always set ahead of his own. His striving for the better and higher gradually led him to a contemplative view of the hereafter. He so shaped his life that it bore fruit from the seed he sowed. Encompassing with his life all that stood close to him; brightening with his gentleness the lives of all whom he touched, his epitaph will be written in the loving memory of thousands.

"There is no death—the thing that we call death
Is but another, sadder name for life,
Which is itself an insufficient name,
Faint recognition of that unknown Life—
That Power whose shadow is the Universe."

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Hon. HENRY Z. OSBORNE, Representative from the tenth district of California, is ill and in the hospital. If he were here to-day he would pay a fitting tribute to our departed friend and colleague.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to announce that Representative JOHN I. NOLAN, of California, is unable to be present to-day on account of illness.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it was my pleasure to know personally and well our late colleague, JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON. I knew him shortly after he left the University of California, at which great institution he graduated with high honors. He was shortly thereafter admitted to the Supreme Court of the State of California and at once entered upon the active practice of the law. In that practice Mr. ELSTON'S ability, persistency, capability, honesty, reliability, and desire to work in his chosen profession soon evidenced themselves, so that he was in a position to gather around him a large clientele of men and women who depended upon his judgment and ability. A short time afterwards Mr. ELSTON was appointed executive secretary of the then Governor of California, Mr. Pardee, and ELSTON performed the responsible duties of that position with success and credit to himself, and was of great assistance to the governor and consequently to the people of the State of California. Then Mr. ELSTON again took up the practice of the law. He soon became interested in all the matters in the community in which he lived in and about the Bay of San Francisco, particularly in the city of Berkeley, where he afterwards established a wide and honorable reputation. He joined a partnership and became not only in the law but in financial matters interested with one of the largest institutions of that city, the First National Bank of Berkeley, whose attorney he became, and eventually one of its guiding directors. In all of these matters Mr. ELSTON was successful.

At a fairly early age he married the daughter of one of the professors of the university, a most charming and lovable woman, and that union brought forth three children, who, with their mother, mourn his early departure. Mrs. Elston was of great and lasting help to Mr. ELSTON in his career.

I became acquainted with Mr. ELSTON in his congressional work upon his entry into the Sixty-fourth Congress, and from my personal knowledge of his character and work I want to say that the State of California had no better, more loyal and faithful worker than our departed colleague. The people of his State will miss his services. Many of her institutions will miss his sympathetic aid. He had a deep interest in anything that advanced the State of California. He had a deeper interest in anything that advanced humanity generally and that was of benefit to the country of which he was a native citizen.

Our colleague was an American not only by birth but by spirit, thought and word, and deed, believing in and carrying out the principles of this Government and the things for which it stands. He wanted to see the great historic landmarks of California perpetuated and her early institutions preserved so that they might be familiar to the present and coming generations. He assisted in every way in upbuilding and preserving those relics. He was very conscientious and earnest in his work for conservation, in building up our national parks, conserving our water supply, and preventing the floods of our rivers from destroying property.

There was no better friend in the House of Representatives during our late colleague's activities on behalf of those much abused but neglected Indians of our State who ought to have had and really need care, assistance, and encouragement. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON was their friend. He gave of his ability and work in assisting them in attempting to secure the rights that honestly, fully, and fairly belonged to them. I have felt, and these people have felt, and their friends have felt, the untimely loss of our colleague and his early leaving them without his aid and assistance. Mr. ELSTON was a loyal friend. He was a conscientious legislator. He was a man of splendid ability. He realized the value of a friend, and fully appreciated the responsibilities of a public official, and, to my estimate and judgment of him, he tried at all times to meet up with what every public official ought to do, looking always forward and never backward, for the purpose of the general development, better conditions, and better opportunities for those who still remain. The family will miss him and his place can not be supplied. The city of Berkeley will mourn his loss and the State of California has lost a true and trusted and tried friend; the Nation has lost one of its best legislators and faithful servants.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, when our friend and colleague, JOHN A. ELSTON, passed from this life he left in the membership of this House a universal feeling of loss. As a friend and associate of Mr. ELSTON from his State, I felt that loss personal. In my acquaintance I knew him as a congenial, sincere, and unselfish friend. I appreciated him as a Representative in Congress. Having a more or less intimate knowledge of his high motives and useful service here, I felt his passing was a loss to our State and country.

Mr. ELSTON was a modest man. Though he had been many years in public life, he had nothing of that cunning insincerity that in popular opinion is associated with the name "politician." He was broad in his conception of duty and opportunity. He had an ideal and standard of public service that far removed him from the career of the mere time server and that made repugnant to him a slavish adherence to merely partisan movements. He brought to the membership of this House a clean mind, keen in its perceptions, a self-relying thoughtfulness, a modest courage, and a progressive purpose that has made his career one of honor to himself and of usefulness and fidelity to his State and country.

As his years of membership increased, so too did his experience, his responsibility, and his usefulness. As the sphere of his action and influence broadened his duties multiplied, and the more he was known and trusted the more increasingly and implicitly he enjoyed the regard, confidence, and the affection of his fellow Members. He assumed positions of responsibility in which he proved his initiative and good judgment.

From the day of his entrance into Congress until the hour when fate removed him, he never lost but steadily gained in the friendship, respect, and affection of our Members. In the hour of his greatest usefulness, while seemingly many years of happiness and opportunity belonged to him, the end came, and the account of his life was closed. The balance sheet has been struck, and none will deny that Mr. ELSTON left behind him a memory of kindness, of service, of fidelity to duty that has earned the affectionate memory of friends, the love of kindred, and the gratitude of the people of his State.

Our common sense and experience, aided by the scientific inventions of man, have enabled us to accurately ascertain the weight, value, and the quality of nearly all things earthly. But the genius of man has been unable to accurately measure the worth, value, and service of a human being. We may know definitely of man's good deeds and his service, but their value can never be defined or limited. A life of service excites our approval and our praise, but who has the temerity to definitely place the limit of its value?

Some one has said that no one knows how far a little light burning in the darkness may cast its rays. No one knows how far and how unending may be the influence of a cheerful word, an encouraging thought, a faithful service, or of an inspiring deed. All are conscious of these things. Where is the man or woman so devoid of susceptibility, appreciation, and inspiration that they can not recount simple inspiring words or deeds of others that have contributed to their own development of character, moral uprightness, happiness, and material success? Happily for civilization the upbuilding influence thus set in motion gains momentum and moves along from year to year, person to person, and from generation to generation. Countless numbers may be unconsciously blessed by the inspiring action, the memory of which has long passed away.

The most humble of men, depressed by the thought of how little he may bring into the world to make it better and happier, may yet find hope and inspiration in the thought that to everyone is given the opportunity to be the author of those kindly ministrations from which others may find renewed hope, inspiration, and useful service of unmeasured and unending value.

The work of Congress to the individual Member is largely without those concrete results that give man a sense of accomplishment and satisfaction that can not be quite equaled otherwise. Our Member of greatest ability and fidelity is only one of 435 Members. His contribution to the work of Congress, to legislation, and to the attainment of the purposes and ideals of the Republic are merged in the aggregate results of our labors.

None are so necessary, so important, or so powerful but that they may pass out of our portals to-day, and to-morrow the great machinery of government moves on, giving little or no indication of the change or of its loss.

It is well that such is true. Ill fortune, indeed, would it be if the passing of an individual should long remain a calamity to our country or mar its progress.

The ambitious may serve here and in the hour of success, I doubt not, even our greatest and most worthy statesmen have been keenly conscious of failing to make that contribution to the welfare of their country to which their industry, their patriotism, and their genius disposed them.

In this great legislative body, composed of representatives of 110,000,000 people, there is yet no better test of service than the Savior applied when He said, "She hath done what she could." For him upon whom that praise can be bestowed there can be no higher reward.

In his service here, in committee room, in his association with our membership, in his votes, and on the floor of this House, Mr. ELSTON earned that commendation.

The humblest of Members sent here to represent the people of the Nation acts in a position of great responsibility and opportunity. His votes contribute to the weal or woe of the Nation. His wisdom or his folly or his fidelity or his faithlessness, his independence or his subservience, his courage or his cowardice, is transmitted into laws of the land and the administration of the Government. When his personal or political welfare is in conflict with the interests of the State, whose interest shall he sacrifice—his own or his country's? Then, who will minimize the Member's task?

Mr. ELSTON met that task. His service was never ostentatious, but always useful, worthy, and intelligent.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day in honor of the memory of our late colleague, JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, of California. Congressman ELSTON was truly a high type of American citizen and a splendid specimen of western manhood. Born in California, the son of Allen Mandeville and Florence Elliott Elston, he there reached man's estate, and during his entire lifetime California was his home. He was educated at Hesperian College, of which his father was president, and later at the University of California. Always a lover of nature and the great outdoors, he imbibed the spirit of broad-minded toleration that ever characterized his associations with his fellow men.

He was a student and the search for knowledge held for him a fascination. As a member of the legal profession his power of deduction, his clear analytical thinking, his logic, placed him in the front rank.

JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON occupied a prominent place in the public life of his State. As executive secretary of Gov. George C. Pardee he performed the duties of that responsible office with marked ability. His responsibilities as a citizen and his civic duties were met and performed with courage, efficiency, and generosity.

Four times he was honored by the people of his district by being chosen as their Representative in the Congress of the United States. As a legislator he was honest, courageous, and independent. In matters of legislation the human element was never overlooked and he was always an advocate of laws which improved the conditions of men and tended to create for humanity higher standards and higher ideals.

I can not forget his generosity to me when I was first elected to Congress. Though we were strangers, he wrote to me offering his assistance and advice. I came to know him as a friend before I had made his acquaintance. I did not hesitate to seek his aid, and to me he was a real colleague. During our service in this House he was ever helpful, and his kindly interest in my problems and his generous cooperation in their solution caused a realization of the fact that he was a true friend in every sense of the word.

In politics JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON always stood for the better things. He deplored conditions which gave power and control to the few at the expense of the many. He believed that the people were fully capable of selecting their own candidates, electing their own officials, and administering their own Government. Always a stanch advocate of clean politics, he knew no political boss and recognized fealty only to the people.

He was a delightful companion. His keen intellect, ready wit, and well-timed humor, his happy manner of expression, insured him a welcome in any company. His companionship was sought by his colleagues and friends, and his fund of information enlightened any conversation. A ready controversialist, an ardent advocate, he bore no animosities, but always entertained the friendliest feelings for an opponent and recognized fully the right of anyone to hold a contrary opinion.

Those who knew Congressman ELSTON realize that in his passing they have lost a true friend, and they wish for him eternal happiness in the world beyond.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, death is always enshrouded in mystery, but in the death of Mr. ELSTON it is doubly enshrouded in mystery. He attained success in all his undertakings that had come to him. Loved and respected by all, yet by a trick of fate his life was ended. May we therefore ask:

What is life? A sigh, a tear,
A something working dark and drear;
A flash of joy, an hour of woe,
A thought of happiness, when, lo,
The messenger of death draws nigh,
His finger pointed to the sky;
It gently falls, glides over hearts;
The curtain falls, we've played our parts.

And so it was with our late colleague. To the wife and children who were left behind it is hard to bear, but let them remember that those who knew him will always remember him as a dutiful husband, a loving father, a conscientious citizen, a faithful and respected public servant.

Death is always hard to explain. Down through the centuries scholars have written, scientists have endeavored to explain, and religious teachers have tried to ease off the terror of death, and yet out of the darkness, out of our memory simply comes the thought that somehow, some day, we will understand; that out of the grief and sorrow and tragedy of life, out of the pains of the stricken minds and hearts, have arisen great thoughts and great deeds of this world. And I think we may well say that somehow the eyes that have been washed with tears come to have a clearer vision of the beauty of holiness and of service and of God. To those of us who knew JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON well I believe we can feel and say that—

His sun went down in the morning,
While all was fair and bright,
But it was not an eclipse of darkness
That hid him from our sight,
For the valley of death was brighter
Than the hills of the life he trod
And the peace that fell on his spirit
Was the calm, deep peace of God.
His sun went down in the morning
While all was fair and bright,
But it shines to-day on the hills far away
In the land that knows no night.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to allow this occasion to pass without saying a few words in memory of him whom I am proud to have called my friend.

JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON commanded the respect and esteem of all who knew him. On first impression his retiring disposition, his quiet and unassuming manner attracted little attention, but on further acquaintance one came to a fuller realization of his many sterling qualities which in any community and in any body of men won him a place among its leaders. He was highly educated, a lover of art and nature, but above all he was a lover of his home and his family, which were always his first concern, and of whom he was justly proud. He was, in every sense of the word, an honorable and refined gentleman. No act in his whole life could be justly made the foundation of any criticism whatsoever. He did no man a wrong, but on the contrary his life was one of labor and effort in behalf of others. He possessed a high sense of duty and gave to the people of his district and of the Nation a loyal and patriotic service. He sought no public honors, but his intrinsic merit and worth marked him as the man who was best capable of representing his district, and so his neighbors drafted him and sent him here, where he served with honor to them and to himself, and where he could have continued to serve as long as he desired.

However, some phases of public life were not to his liking. He was sensitive by nature, and being himself kindly and sympathetic he expected the same of others. Although he saw much of public life, he never became reconciled to that seemingly necessary incident of public service, the ordinary, everyday criticisms that come to all public officials, and which, like the rain, falls on the just and the unjust alike.

He possessed a mind of extraordinary ability. It worked incessantly and at lightning speed, and the regret is that nature did not see fit to endow it with a stronger body, better able to nourish and support it. Notwithstanding his physical frailty, he continued always to give to his work unselfishly of all that he possessed. His life was a life of service and endeavor for others.

No man in this House ever tried more conscientiously to represent his constituents, more worthily to perform his duties, or more faithfully to discharge his trust than JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON. It is fitting that his place has not yet been filled, and among his friends it can never be filled by another.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, the fitting tributes which have been paid here to-day to our late colleague and friend are, unfortunately, those which only mere words can utter, but down in the hearts not only of the California delegation but of every Member of this House there is a deeper tribute to which words can never adequately give expression. Upon my arrival in Washington as a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress, it was my honor and great pleasure to soon form the acquaintance of our friend, JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON. His sympathetic nature, his kindly word, his attitude of tolerance toward all mankind soon endeared him to me. His offers of assistance, his suggestions were of no mean value in those first days which every new Member has to experience, and so it was that in the course of his public career he never lost sight of those human and homely qualities which are not only the essence of good-fellowship but are the marks of highest statesmanship.

Our friend, as has been said here to-day, was taken from us in the prime of life and in the prime of achievement. In leaving us as he did we recognize that that great problem of death, to which my colleague, Mr. FREE, has referred, remains to us an insoluble mystery. We miss him, the country, the State, the community which he served miss him. The wife and the beautiful children whom he left behind will miss him now and will miss him more in years to come. However, Mr. Speaker, our colleague has left behind imperishable memories, to be cherished in the recollection of those who knew him. It may be truly said of him that to know him was to love him, and when he passed from this mortal sphere to life everlasting, his going served to remind those who have remained that the achievements of this world are insignificant, provided we may leave behind us memories and friendships which will live forever hereafter.

The little grain of sand on the ocean beach is small in the universe. So it is that the life of the individual seems to be an infinitesimal part in that great scheme which the Divine hand has devised. But, as our friend ELSTON so fittingly exemplified, each of us should aspire to leave behind us footprints on the sands of time which will remind those who come after that the real achievements of life are not the ones to which the public generally gives credit and consideration during our lifetime. It is only when the proper perspective is gained of man's life and character that his real worth is known. So it is that our friend in passing from life unto death has caused us to reflect back on those worthy qualities which have been so fittingly eulogized here to-day. Mr. Speaker, truly I can say that I feel it was a great honor and a great privilege to have been the friend of JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, though my acquaintance with Representative JOHN A. ELSTON of the sixth district of California was somewhat limited, he coming from the extreme southwestern and I from the extreme southeastern part of our country, it is a happy thing that personal friendship is not confined to any one section of our country, but is often nation-wide.

Mr. ELSTON impressed me as a man of great ability, untiring energy, and high personal character. He had filled many positions of public trust in his home State, and filled them so well that he was called to a wider field of usefulness—that of national lawmaker. In this field of labor he served so acceptably that he was reelected three times in succession. He was devoted to the interest of his district and State and served them faithfully and well. He had the respect and admiration of all who knew him. Well had he earned the rest that awaited him when the end came.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and my honor to be among the acquaintances and friends of the late lamented Congressman JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, and I would be doing violence to the memory of that friendship did I not on this occasion pay my tribute of love and respect. Once more death has entered our ranks, found a shining mark, and with relentless stroke quenched the activities of a busy and useful life. In the flower of his manhood his passing was, indeed, untimely. He was a man of true nobility of soul, of fine intellect, character, and ability; a man of strong and true convictions; a man who believed above all in his country. He was a typical native son of the Golden Gate State. He loved his far-off home in the westland, and never tired of telling of the virtues of the State of his birth. His patriotism was unbounded; he believed in America and in American ideals. He was an honor to his family, to his home, to his State, and to his Nation.

There was nothing of the sham about him; he abhorred hypocrisy; he accomplished results without ostentation. He found recreation, entertainment, and pleasure in outdoor life; he loved to get close to nature. The hills, the valleys, the streams, the mountains, all were majestic to him. He was a great reader, a natural student from childhood, and, therefore, acquired and retained a wealth of information; he was truly an educated gentleman of the highest type. He will be missed by all who knew him, and his friends were numbered by his acquaintances.

I first met Mr. ELSTON in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress. I was attracted to him by his splendid personality and his courteous manner. He talked about things worth while—always good company, ever instructive. His word was always cheery, his presence always radiated a warmth of good fellowship; he was an optimist. I saw him last on the Sunday preceding his death. He was in his usual good spirits, talked of his home and his family as usual, and I can not and never will understand why his death.

I was one of the party of Senators and Representatives accompanying the funeral party from the city of Washington to Berkeley, Calif. I read from the editorial columns of Mr. ELSTON'S home newspapers most commendatory mention of his life and character, of his unerring integrity, and of the position he held in the hearts of the home folks. I viewed the gathering of his sorrowing friends and neighbors, I beheld the wealth of floral tributes; I knew that I had not misjudged the man, and realized the more that while the Nation had lost a wise legislator and the State a distinguished son, the community had lost an energetic, patriotic, and respected citizen, and the common folks had lost a real friend.

Mr. BIXLER. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to have personal acquaintance with Mr. ELSTON until the beginning of this Congress. I might say I remember him as being one of the first to greet and welcome me to the House on my arrival here. I shall never forget his warm cordiality and open-heartedness, his ever willingness to aid and assist, his kindly suggestions, and wise counsel. I soon found he was a man of sterling qualities, loyal and devoted in his friendships, faithful and active in his political duties. He despised sham, and on the other hand respected and admired ability and honesty of purpose. He has answered the last roll call. He has been gathered to his fathers. Those with whom he served so faithfully, so honestly, so devotedly will ever cherish his memory. The good-by here is good morning there and the night somewhere else a dawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend remarks on the life and character of Representative ELSTON, I desire to state that my remembrance of him is firmly fixed by reason of his uniform courtesy to all Members. Mr. ELSTON was never preoccupied to the extent of omitting to salute his acquaintances in his dignified, gentlemanly manner.

I often wondered if he knew each and every Member of Congress by name.

I did not have the honor and pleasure of an intimate acquaintance with him; in fact, our social intercourse consisted simply of an informal introduction, but I shall always remember that from my first day in Congress he knew me, and a friendship, such as is understood by those who greet each other from day to day for a period of time, developed.

Mr. ELSTON has passed on, and I shall always think of him as my friend who every day bade me good morning in his kindly, courteous, noneffusive way.

Mr. RAKER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, to all earthly things there is a beginning and to all an end save only man; the flesh withers and turns to dust but the soul lives on.

The morning-glory lifts its head from dark sleep at dawn, follows the course of the sun, smiling happily on all of nature, till evening comes to find it drooping to slumber once again. So it is with man, and if it is in another sphere he awakens on the morrow it is a better sphere.

JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON was born February 10, 1874, at Woodland, Calif., and died in the city of Washington, December 15, 1921. He was the son of the Rev. Allen Mandeville and Florence (Elliott) Elston, and lived his youth in the broad valley of the Sacramento under the shadows of the majestic mountains of the Coast Range and the imposing and inspiring snow-capped Sierra Nevadas.

In 1892 he graduated from Hesperian College at Woodland, of which his father was president, and in 1897 graduated from the University of California and started the practice of law in Berkeley, the city of his alma mater.

A student by nature and a friend of his fellow man by inclination, his abilities and charm of manner commanded the attention of that great Californian, Dr. George C. Pardee, and upon his elevation to the governorship of the State in 1903 he prevailed upon the young and brilliant attorney to accompany him to Sacramento as executive secretary to the governor.

During this period of four years he met all of the leaders of thought and action in California, and came to be held in high esteem throughout the State for the diligence and distinguished ability he displayed in the performance of his duties.

Upon completion of this public service he again took up the practice of law, succeeding in his chosen profession far beyond the success that is usual to men of his years in this most distinguished of professions.

From 1911 to 1914 he was a member of the board of trustees of the State Institution for the Deaf and Blind and did splendid humanitarian service for the promotion of the material welfare and practical educational development of the unfortunates in the institution.

Upon the insistence of the people of his district he became a candidate for the office of Representative in Congress from the sixth California district and was elected by a large majority to the Sixty-fourth Congress and reelected to the Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, and Sixty-seventh Congresses.

In 1919 he was appointed Regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

As a Member of Congress you, my colleagues, knew him well, and all came to love him as I have known and loved him for years, and now revere his memory.

He served his district, his State, and his Nation honorably and well, considering never personal aggrandizement or advantage, having wholly and solely in mind the happiness, advancement, and welfare of the people. He typified the highest and noblest conception of devotion to the public service.

Sorrowfully we number him with the departed and remember with grief that can never be assuaged ARTHUR ELSTON the gentleman, the manly fellow, the studious scholar, the able patriot, the diligent servant of the people, the erudite lawyer, and the lovable friend whom we may see no more on this earthly sphere.

The reputation of the Congress of the United States as an institution, ennobled by the traditional ability and integrity of the great and noble men now gone who have served here as Members of the House of Representatives, is enriched by the memory of JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, of California. The empire Commonwealth of California, that has given so many illustrious men to the Nation, engraves his name affectionately on its scroll of honor.

His venerable father, his saintly mother, his bereaved brother and sister, his beloved widowed wife and orphaned children have the affectionate sympathy of the Congress that feels mutually with them a great personal loss.

Mr. CURRY resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, Members will be granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public services of our deceased Member, JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON. And now, in accordance with the resolution heretofore adopted, the House will stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 26, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 26, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of paragraph 408, shingles, page 93, line 12.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the report will be received.

PORT OF NEW YORK AUTHORITY.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 337) granting consent of Congress and authority to the Port of New York Authority to execute the comprehensive plan approved by the States of New York and New Jersey, by chapter 43, Laws of New York, 1922, and chapter 9, Laws of New Jersey, 1922. I call the matter to the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas pursuant to the agreement or compact entered into by the States of New York and New Jersey under date of April 30, 1921, and consented to by the Congress of the United States by resolution signed by the President on the 23d day of August, 1921, the two States have agreed upon a comprehensive plan for the development of the port of New York; and

Whereas the carrying out and executing of the said plan will the better promote and facilitate commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations and provide better and cheaper transportation of property and aid in providing better postal, military, and other services of value to the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That, subject to the approval of the officers and agents of the United States as required by acts of Congress touching the jurisdiction and control of the United States over the matters, or any part thereof, covered by this resolution, the consent of Congress is hereby given to the supplemental agreement between the States of New York and New Jersey evidenced by chapter 43, Laws of New York, 1922, and chapter 9, Laws of New Jersey, 1922, covering the comprehensive plan for the development of the port of New York embraced in said statutes in form following, that is to say:

"SECTION 1. Principles to govern the development:

"First. That terminal operations within the port district, so far as economically practicable, should be unified.

"Second. That there should be consolidation of shipments at proper classification points so as to eliminate duplication of effort, inefficient loading of equipment, and realize reduction in expenses.

"Third. That there should be the most direct routing of all commodities so as to avoid centers of congestion, conflicting currents, and long truck hauls.

"Fourth. That terminal stations established under the comprehensive plan should be union stations, so far as practicable.

"Fifth. That the process of coordinating facilities should, so far as practicable, adopt casting facilities as integral parts of the new system, so as to avoid needless destruction of existing capital investment and reduce so far as may be possible the requirements for new capital; and endeavor should be made to obtain the consent of local municipalities within the port district for the coordination of their present and contemplated port and terminal facilities with the whole plan.

"Sixth. That freight from all railroads must be brought to all parts of the port wherever practicable without cars breaking bulk, and this necessitates tunnel connection between New Jersey and Long Island and tunnel or bridge connections between other parts of the port.

"Seventh. That there should be urged upon the Federal authorities improvement of channels so as to give access for that type of waterborne commerce adapted to the various forms of development which the respective shore fronts and adjacent lands of the port would best lend themselves to.

"Eighth. That highways for motor-truck traffic should be laid out so as to permit the most efficient interrelation between terminals, piers, and industrial establishments not equipped with railroad sidings and for the distribution of building materials and many other commodities which must be handled by trucks; these highways to connect with existing or projected bridges, tunnels, and ferries.

"Ninth. That definite methods for prompt relief should be devised which can be applied for the better coordination and operation of existing facilities while larger and more comprehensive plans for future development are being carried out.

"SEC. 2. The bridges, tunnels, and belt lines forming the comprehensive plan are generally and in outline indicated on maps filed by the Port of New York Authority in the offices of the secretaries of the States of New York and New Jersey and are hereinafter described in outline.

"SEC. 3. Tunnels and bridges to form part of the plan: (a) A tunnel or tunnels connecting the New Jersey shore and the Brooklyn shore of New York to provide through-line connection between the transcontinental railroads now having their terminals in New Jersey with the Long Island Railroad and the New York connecting railroad on Long Island and with the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad in the Bronx, and to provide continuous transportation of freight between the Queens, Brooklyn, and Bronx sections of the port to and from all parts of the westerly section of the port for all of the transcontinental railroads. (b) A bridge and/or tunnel across or under the Arthur Kill, and/or the existing bridge enlarged to provide direct freight carriage between New Jersey and Staten Island. (c) The location of all such tunnels or bridges to be at the shortest, most accessible, and most economical points practicable, taking account of existing facilities now located within the port district and providing for and taking account of all reasonably foreseeable future growth in all parts of the district.

"SEC. 4. Manhattan service: The island of Manhattan to be connected with New Jersey by bridge or tunnel, or both, and freight destined to and from Manhattan to be carried underground, so far as practicable by such system, automatic electric as hereinafter described or otherwise, as will furnish the most expeditious, economical, and practicable transportation of freight, especially meat, produce, milk, and other commodities comprising the daily needs of the people. Suitable markets, union inland terminal stations, and warehouses to be laid out at points most convenient to the homes and industries upon the island, the said system to be connected with all the transcontinental railroads terminating in New Jersey and by appropriate connection with the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and the Long Island Railroads.

"SEC. 5. Belt lines: The numbers hereinafter used correspond with the numbers which have been placed on the map of the comprehensive plan to identify the various belt lines and marginal railroads.

"No. 1, middle belt line: Connects New Jersey and Staten Island and the railroads on the westerly side of the port with Brooklyn, Queens, the Bronx, and the railroads on the easterly side of the port. Connects with the New York Central Railroad in the Bronx; with the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad in the Bronx; with the Long Island Railroad in Queens and Brooklyn; with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad near Elizabethport and in Staten Island; with the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey at Elizabethport and at points in Newark and Jersey City; with the Pennsylvania Railroad in Newark and Jersey City; with the Lehigh Valley Railroad in Newark and Jersey City; with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad in Jersey City and the Secaucus meadows; with the Erie Railroad in Jersey City and the Secaucus meadows; with the New York, Susquehanna & Western, the New York, Ontario & Western, and the West Shore Railroads on the westerly side of the Palisades above the Weehawken Tunnel.

"The route of the middle belt line, as shown on said map, is in general as follows: Commencing at the Hudson River at Spuyten Duyvil, running easterly and southerly generally along the easterly side of the Harlem River, utilizing existing lines so far as practicable and improving and adding where necessary, to a connection with Hell Gate Bridge and the New Haven Railroad, a distance of approximately 7 miles; thence continuing in a general southerly direction, utilizing existing lines and improving and adding where necessary, to a point near Bay Ridge, a distance of approximately 18½ miles; thence by a new tunnel under New York Bay in a northwesterly direction to a portal in Jersey City or Bayonne, a distance of approximately 5 miles, to a connection with the tracks of the Pennsylvania and Lehigh Valley Railroads; thence in a generally northerly direction along the easterly side of Newark Bay and the Hackensack River at the westerly foot of the Palisades, utilizing existing tracks and improving and adding where necessary, making connections with the Jersey Central, Pennsylvania, Lehigh Valley, Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, Erie, New York, Susquehanna & Western, New York, Ontario & Western, and West Shore Railroads, a distance of approximately 10 miles. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator make a short explanation of the joint resolution?

Mr. CALDER. A joint resolution of similar character, although in slightly different terms, has already passed the Senate. The joint resolution just reported has passed the House. It will be necessary to have a reference of the Senate joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House or to have the Senate agree to the House joint resolution. It applies particularly to the port of New York, in which the States of New York and New Jersey join in a comprehensive plan for the development of the port. I repeat, a similar joint resolution has already passed the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. It carries no appropriation?

Mr. CALDER. It does not.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

EDITORIAL ON THE TARIFF FROM THE EVENING MAIL.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Evening Mail entitled "What a tariff really protects."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the editorial is in favor of the bill?

Mr. CALDER. It is in favor of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Then it is the only paper in New York that favors the bill.

Mr. CALDER. No; it is not the only paper. There are a number of such papers.

Mr. HARRISON. What other papers?

Mr. CALDER. The Brooklyn Standard Union and the Brooklyn Times, for instance.

Mr. HARRISON. I mean in New York City.

Mr. CALDER. That is in New York City.

Mr. HARRISON. No; it is in Brooklyn.

Mr. CALDER. Brooklyn has a population of two and a quarter million people. The Senator from Mississippi has visited there, and I am sure he knows that it is a very considerable part of the city of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

WHAT A TARIFF REALLY PROTECTS.

To-day it is the Sugar Trust that, through the new tariff law, is to get $100,000,000 out of the people!

Yesterday it was the Steel Trust; last week it was the Woolen Goods Trust, or the Cotton Goods Trust, or the Zinc Trust—all to receive huge sums out of a protective tariff.

Now, what are the facts?

Why, American labor concededly gets in one form or another 90 per cent of the price paid by the consumer for every article manufactured. Labor in other countries does not receive that large percentage; that is the reason for a protective tariff. There must be a barrier against foreign goods equal to the difference between wages paid here and wages paid abroad.

America is the richest sales market in the world. It is the one place upon which the eyes and hopes of every manufacturer, foreign or domestic, are centered. Here the competition is sharpest, and even a small advantage is eagerly sought. The importer wants a low tariff so that he can sell for less than the domestic manufacturer's cost levels; the domestic manufacturer wants a tariff high enough to permit him to pay American wages and at the same time be at no disadvantage in the American market.

The question, then, is whether it is better to have American manufacturers paying American wages to produce American goods for sale in the American market, or to permit foreign manufacturers paying foreign wages to produce foreign goods for sale in the American market.

The theory of the tariff bill now under debate in the Senate at Washington is that the products of American labor shall have at least an equal opportunity with foreign products in the American market; where there is doubt, the doubt goes to the American wage earner.

In corporate form he is the Steel Trust, the Woolen Goods Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Zinc Trust, and the Cotton Goods Trust; in actual fact he is the man receiving every week a pay envelope whose contents depend largely upon whether the tariff law sufficiently protects them from a foreign pay envelope very slim by comparison.

ELECTROCHEMISTRY AT NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article from Barron's, of January 30, 1922, entitled "Wealth inexhaustible—Electrochemistry at Niagara Falls."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEALTH INEXHAUSTIBLE—ELECTROCHEMISTRY AT NIAGARA FALLS.

[From Barron's, January 30, 1922.]

"Henry's a little shy on chemistry; that's why he brought me along," said Thomas A. Edison during his recent trip with Henry Ford to the Muscle Shoals hydroelectric superpower plant down in Alabama.

A hydroelectric plant capable of generating 850,000 electric horsepower—and the installed capacity of the Muscle Shoals plant, when completed, is rated at that figure—requires the services of chemists, if it is to become a financial success. The only electric generating plant in the world that can be compared with the proposed Muscle Shoals plant in capacity of output is the Niagara Falls Power Co., and it was chemistry that made a financial success of Niagara Falls power.

THE BIG CENTER.

Niagara Falls is now the world center of the electrochemical industry. More than half of the world's production of ferrosilicon, ferrochrome, caustic, bleach, chlorine, aluminum, calcium carbide, synthetic graphite, air nitrogen and its derivatives, including cyanamide, is produced by Niagara Falls electricity in the city of Niagara Falls, Canada, and Niagara Falls, N. Y. The latter city manufactures more abrasive material, used in the fabrication of sharpening stones and grinding wheels, than is produced elsewhere in the world, and this material comes from the electric furnaces of the electrochemical companies.

The first contract signed by the Niagara Falls Power Co. for utilization of its electricity was with a chemist—Charles M. Hall, inventor of the process for producing aluminum with the aid of electricity.

THE HALL DISCOVERY.

Mr. Hall's father was a professor at Oberlin College. The young man was greatly interested in chemistry and had the run of the college laboratory. He was conducting chemical experiments there when something went wrong. In trying to unravel the tangle in which his experiments were involved he blundered on to the solution of a problem upon which able chemists had been working for years—a practical method for reducing aluminum ores with electricity.

Like most college professors, his father was a poor man. The uncles, cousins, and aunts of the penniless young man came to his assistance and supplied the money to take out patents on his discovery. His claim of prior discovery was disputed, but was successfully defended in the courts.

With no other capital than his patents he went to the most prominent bankers in his native State—Pennsylvania—for capital to build a plant to demonstrate the value of his discovery. These bankers—the Mellons of Pittsburgh—supplied the funds, and a company was organized, known as the Pittsburgh Reduction Co. It was the first of the electrochemical companies to build a plant at Niagara Falls.

In 1895, a quarter of a century ago, this company utilized the first electricity delivered by the Niagara Falls Power Co. To-day this company, now known as the Aluminum Co. of America, is the world's largest producer of aluminum and is the largest single user of electricity in the world.

GROWING POPULARITY OF ALUMINUM.

It was 15 years before aluminum got a real foothold in the metal trades. In 1909, only 13 years ago, began the first use of aluminum in the fabrication of cooking utensils. To-day the larger share of all cooking utensils are made of aluminum. Because of its lightness and strength, manufacturers of high-grade motor cars use large quantities of aluminum. The largest single consumer of aluminum in the world is the Pierce-Arrow Motor Car Co., of Buffalo, N. Y.

Since aluminum began to be used for cooking utensils and the manufacture of motor cars the Aluminum Co. of America has earned handsome profits. The penniless young man who discovered the process for reducing aluminum ores by electricity died a half dozen years ago. The value of his estate was appraised at $23,000,000. The average net earnings of the Aluminum Co. of America have been in excess of $10,000,000 per annum for the last 10 years. In 1901 the total annual world production of aluminum amounted to only 7,150,000 pounds. The Niagara Falls plant of the Aluminum Co. of America now produces approximately 100,000,000 pounds of aluminum per annum.

In 1920 the net operating revenue of the Niagara Falls Power Co. was $6,031,950.91. Its operating expenses, including amortization and operating taxes, amounted to $2,352,023.30, leaving a net operating revenue of $3,679,927.61. A single one of the consumers of its electricity, the Aluminum Co. of America, earned nearly three times the profit from its operations that the power company did.

USING ELECTRICITY IN THE MID-NINETIES AND NOW.

The second contract signed by the Niagara Falls Power Co. was with another chemist, Dr. Edward G. Acheson. He entered into a long-time contract to use 1,000 electric horsepower. At that time 1,000 electric horsepower was a staggering proposition. Previous to 1895 electricity was more or less of a plaything. It was used for telegraphing and telephoning, but its use for lighting and operation of motors and in electric furnaces was feeble, indeed, compared to present use. Up to that time electricity had never been handled in such large chunks as 1,000 horsepower. Apparatus for handling such a large amount had to be invented and specially constructed. To-day Doctor Acheson uses over 100,000 electric horsepower in his several electrochemical enterprises at Niagara Falls.

A few years previous to his coming to Niagara Falls Doctor Acheson had worked for Mr. Edison in his experimental laboratory at East Orange. Then he went out to Monongahela City, Pa., and worked as a chemist for coal miners of that region. It was out in the heart of the bituminous coal fields of Pennsylvania, while carrying on a series of experiments with electricity, that he produced some tiny microscopic crystals. A study of the property of these crystals showed them to be intensely hard and infusible at any known heat.

FINANCING AND MAKING CARBORUNDUM.

With four bricks he constructed a furnace and produced the crystals in considerable quantity. In experimenting to find a use for these crystals he discovered that they made an excellent abrasive. He sold some of the crystals to diamond polishers in New York at the rate of $1,500 per pound. He named his new abrasive carborundum. He, too, took his proposition to the Mellons, and they furnished funds to organize the Carborundum Co.

It took but a short time to flood the diamond-cutting market and the price for carborundum dropped to $400 per pound. Other uses were found for the product as a valve grinder and as grinding material for dentists. The field was limited, and soon the company found that it was steadily losing money. But the financial backers of the Carborundum Co. were not discouraged. They suggested mass production and the manufacture of a general line of abrasives. The power plant at Niagara Falls was nearing completion, and as it was necessary for the success of the enterprise that they have electricity in great quantity and at far cheaper rates than it had heretofore been possible to produce it, they sent Doctor Acheson out there.

A modest plant was built and the first year 1,100,000 pounds of carborundum were produced. To-day the carborundum plant consists of a dozen or more large buildings, covering a score or more acres. Annual production of carborundum runs around 40,000,000 pounds and the product has world-wide use as a grinding and sharpening material.

Five years later Doctor Acheson commenced the manufacture of artificial graphite. This is produced by means of the electric furnace and requires the use of a large and constant supply of electricity. The first year he produced 860,750 pounds of his synthetic graphite. His production now runs around 50,000,000 per annum. This graphite, under the name of Oildag, is largely used for greasing automobile gears.

The history of the many electrochemical companies at Niagara Falls, such as the Union Carbide Co., the Cyanamid Co., Mathieson Alkali Co., the Hooker Electro-Chemical Co., the Oldbury Electro-Chemical Co., and many others, are fascinating stories of financial success made possible by the production of electricity in great quantity and at low costs.

AT NIAGARA FALLS.

The two power companies operating on the American side of Niagara Falls were consolidated in 1918. This consolidation placed under one management all the power plants on the American side and one of the three plants on the Canadian side of the river.

The aggregate installed capacity of the four generating stations on the American side is 561,000 horsepower, while the plant on the Canadian side, owned by this company, generates 112,500 horsepower, which brings the aggregate of this single company up to 673,500 horsepower.

On the Canadian side of the river are three additional generating plants, the Ontario Power Co. and the Toronto Niagara Falls Power Co., with an aggregate capacity now developed of 337,500 horsepower, and the new Chippewa-Queenston Power Canal, with a capacity of 650,000 horsepower. These three generating plants are under the control of the Ontario Power Commission.

The total power now or soon to be available at Niagara Falls is thus as follows:

The Niagara Falls Power Co	673,500
Chippewa-Queenston Power Canal	650,000
Ontario and Toronto Power Cos	337,500
Total electric horsepower	1,661,000

AN AVALANCHE OF WATER.

One hundred million tons of water flow over the brink of Niagara Falls every hour, 15,000,000 cubic feet per minute. The Government did not build this dam. Nature constructed it. It is estimated that this fall of water is capable of producing 3,800,000 electric horsepower. This is for the falls alone and does not take into consideration the additional hydraulic head from the rapids above and below the falls.

Whence the source of this tremendous flow of water? The Niagara River is the outlet of the following lakes:

Lake Superior, 350 miles long, 160 miles wide, 1,030 feet deep.
Lake Huron, 260 miles long, 100 miles wide, 1,000 feet deep.
Lake Michigan, 320 miles long, 70 miles wide, 1,000 feet deep.
Lake St. Clair, 40 miles long, 15 miles wide, 20 feet deep.
Lake Erie, 290 miles long, 65 miles wide, 84 feet deep.

This enormous volume of water finds an outlet toward the sea by way of the Niagara River, which, within a short distance, drops 336 feet as follows:

	Feet.
From Lake Erie to rapids above the Falls	15
In the rapids above the Falls	55
At the Falls	161
From foot of Falls to outlet of gorge, 7 miles	98
From gorge to Lake Ontario	7
Total fall	336

The flow of Niagara is as immutable as the tides, always a stable, reliable quantity. There are no springtime or fall floods, but it is always the same, and the only thing that appears to affect it are the winds. With a strong wind blowing up the river the flow of water is visibly decreased. If the wind blows strongly down the river from Lake Erie the flow of water over the Falls is largely increased.

It is likely that 75,000 years ago when the ice receded from the Great Lakes region Niagara Falls was located at what is now the Niagara escarpment, 7 miles below the present Falls. For thousands of years the falling waters pounded over the brink, gradually carving out the great gorge, several miles long, from half a mile to a mile wide and several hundred feet deep. The ceaseless pounding wore this great chasm out of the solid rock.

A NEW CANAL.

The day before Christmas, 1921, water was turned into the new Chippewa-Queenston Power Canal. This canal cost $65,000,000 to dig, and an additional $15,000,000 is required to complete installation of 10 generating units which will produce 650,000 electric horsepower. The canal starts above the rapids at the beginning of the Falls and for 12½ miles traverses the topmost bank of the river, circling the lower rapids and whirlpool and outlets at Queenston Heights.

The greatest hydraulic head of the plants already built at the Falls is 215 feet. The new Chippewa-Queenston plant will be able to take advantage of a 310-foot hydraulic head. Both Canada and the United States are allowed, under treaty agreement, to take 20,000 cubic feet of water per second from above the Falls. By construction of this power canal the Canadians gain vastly in the power developed.

The Niagara Falls Power Co. has plans drawn for a duplicate of the Chippewa-Queenston Canal on the American side of the river. It will be so constructed that it will be capable of future extension to meet further increases in the demand for power and the possible enlargement of the amount of water to be taken from above the Falls.

Great as are the wonderful things that electricity had accomplished in the past 25 years there is the thought in the minds of thinking men that the next quarter of a century is to see an even greater development.

The superpower plan for the electrification of all railroads and most industries between Boston and Washington is something more than a pipe dream. The United States Geological Survey and eminent engineers declare the plan practical. In a short 10 years it could be got into full operation. In dollars alone it has been figured that it would save $190,000,000 per annum. It would cost $900,000,000.

A PERMANENT FUEL.

In the vivid and critical retrospect of the past, which Mr. Wells has given us in his Outline of History, there is no achievement of man that can compare with the marvelous things that have been accomplished for the benefit of the human race with the aid of electricity. Coal is one of the sources of wealth, so is oil, but coal and oil deposits are exhaustible. Water supply is inexhaustible. A short 25 years ago and our falling waters were for the most part allowed to run to waste. We have learned to harness water falls, and now white coal in the form of invisible, vibrating currents of power are sent out from great power plants on radiating threads of copper and made to yield wealth—wealth from an inexhaustible source.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11228) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

JUDGMENTS BY UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS (S. DOC. NO. 222).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of judgments rendered against the Government by district courts of the United States requiring an appropriation for their payment, in amount $81,574.56, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Hickory Mantle Manufacturing Co. (Inc.), of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against any reduction in the tariff duty on gas mantles as proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS presented resolutions of the council of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying the Congress to pass the bill making appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio River, in order that the public may have its use at the earliest possible time, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDGE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance resolutions of the National Disabled Soldiers' League, in annual State convention assembled at Long Branch, N. J., protesting against the reduction in training pay and the retention of bonuses paid trainees by employers.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States Veterans' Bureau has issued an order whereby the training pay of disabled soldiers in placement training was reduced for the amount of bonuses paid for faithful service by the business men training such disabled soldiers; and

Whereas that order was rescinded on February 17, 1922, and effective that date all those same trainees placed back upon full pay; and

Whereas many disabled soldiers were reduced in accordance with this order; and

Whereas some of those reduced have not had refunded to them these moneys withheld; and

Whereas refunds in a few cases have been made and those not receiving refunds feel that they are treated unjustly and the National Disabled Soldiers' League, in annual State convention assembled at Long Branch, N. J., feel that this injustice should be righted: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the training pay reductions made in accordance with this order be refunded to the disabled soldiers; and be it further

Resolved, That the training pay of disabled soldiers in vocational training be maintained at its present amount, and that the bonuses received by the disabled soldiers be not interfered with by the United States Veterans' Bureau; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senator WALTER E. EDGE and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD asking the protection of the United States Congress for our disabled soldiers, and that a copy be sent to Col. R. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Approved by the National Disabled Soldiers' League in annual convention at Long Branch this 18th day of June, 1922.

THOMAS V. FIELDS,
State Commander.

Attested:

FRANK J. COVART,
State Adjutant.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $280.32 to pay William Howard May and $77.13 to pay William K. Jackson, and to allow credits in the accounts of John H. McLean, former paymaster of the Panama Canal—$470.12 paid to Charles R. Williams, $403.33 paid to Miguel A. Otero, $214.83 paid to Burt New, and $114.68 paid to George A. Connolly, all being in connection with rent of quarters in the Canal Zone, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING submitted an amendment providing that to carry out the provisions of the act of May 27, 1902 (32 Stat., p. 263), and other acts relating thereto and amendatory thereof, for the sale of lands in the former Uintah Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, ceded by the Uintah and White River Tribes of Ute Indians to the United States, and for the reimbursement of the United States out of the proceeds of such sale for any moneys advanced to said Indians and the use of the remainder for their benefit, jurisdiction be conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment on the claims and rights of said Indians under the acts aforesaid to compensation for all lands in said reservation which have been set apart and reserved for forest reservation and other public uses, as if sold and disposed of under the public land laws of the United States, in accordance with the terms of the said act, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,977.77 to reimburse John G. Sessions for losses incurred by him in performance of contract work in 1917 and 1918 in the construction of a levee on the Mississippi River, in Issaquena County, Miss., known as the Ellesly enlargement, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 310), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the consent of the Senate is hereby given to an adjournment of the House of Representatives to Tuesday, August 8, 1922.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor the telegram which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

LOWELL, MASS., June 24, 1922.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Representing the coal trade of Lowell and, we believe, the sentiment of northern New England, we urge upon you the necessity of action that will cause the resumption of anthracite coal mining not later than July 15. There appears to be a deadlock, and some national action is necessary in order to get the men back to work. If the mining of anthracite coal is not resumed by July 15, there will be great mental and physical distress in this north country later in the year.

Stocks in New England coal yards are rapidly decreasing, and within 30 days will be exhausted in so far as domestic coal is concerned.

As citizens of this country, we are shocked beyond expression at the atrocious massacre at Herrin, Ill.

LOWELL COAL MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION,
E. A. WILSON, President.
T. T. HAZEWOOD, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I recently received from the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America a bulletin on the coal controversy, prepared by the research department, commission on the church and social service.

This bulletin discusses many and varied aspects of the coal controversy, including the coal strike. It also contains a discussion of the question, "What is wrong with the coal industry?" The information contained in this bulletin is exceedingly valuable, and the analysis of this important problem very instructive. Some proposals are suggested for the solution of the coal problem which are worthy of study and consideration.

The purpose in preparing the data contained in this bulletin and the issuance of the information contained therein may be best understood by quoting from the foreword:

> The most elementary facts concerning the coal industry, upon which a moral judgment of its problems must rest, have not, up to this time, been made widely available in compact and inexpensive form. Some of what has been published appears to the public mind to be not so much information as propaganda. The present bulletin has been prepared in order to correct misapprehensions as to known facts concerning the coal industry, to give wider currency to the results of valuable studies already made, to show the need of more facts, and to clarify the moral issues of the present controversy.

The representatives of these various religious bureaus and organizations are to be commended for their efforts to emphasize the moral problems in this controversy.

I ask that the bulletin referred to be presented in the nature of a petition and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the tariff bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out line 12, page 93, in the following words:

> PAR. 408. Shingles, 50 cents per thousand.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think we had better have a quorum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator withhold his request for just a moment? I am going to make the same request, but I would like to make a little preliminary statement.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My colleague and I are particularly interested in this paragraph, as representatives of the principal shingle-producing State in the Union. The State of Washington produces about 75 per cent of all the shingles made in the United States. There is about $16,000,000 invested in shingle mills in Oregon and Washington. I shall in a moment, for the purpose of giving my colleague an opportunity to be present, accept the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, but in the meantime, before that is done, I would like to say that what we are asking in regard to shingles is that the rate fixed by the House shall be retained, and that the proposed amendment of the Senate Finance Committee now pending, to put shingles on the free list by striking out section 408 of the bill which places a duty of 50 cents a thousand on shingles, be rejected.

Later on I expect to give some data as to wages respectively in British Columbia and in Washington and Oregon. I expect to call attention to the fact that in British Columbia labor in the shingle mills is oriental. I shall show particularly that the wages paid there are much lower than the wages paid white labor in the shingle mills of Washington and Oregon. I expect to show that the oriental labor, principally Chinamen, working in the shingle mills of British Columbia work 10 hours a day, whereas the white labor working in the shingle mills of Washington and Oregon work 8 hours a day.

We from Washington and Oregon have supported the general policy and plan contained in the bill of a protective tariff, and in return for the support which we are giving to that policy, which we regard as either a national policy or one that is absolutely indefensible, we ask that the great industries of our section of the country shall receive the benefit of it; that we either go upon the basis of a tariff for revenue only and do away with the policy of protection or else that we make it uniform in its application throughout the country.

Now, in order that other Senators who are interested in the question may be present, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Rawson
Ball	Hale	McCumber	Robinson
Borah	Harris	McLean	Sheppard
Bursum	Harrison	McNary	Simmons
Calder	Heflin	Moses	Smith
Cameron	Johnson	Nelson	Smoot
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Spencer
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sterling
Cummins	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
du Pont	Keyes	Overman	Warren
Edge	Ladd	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	La Follette	Poindexter	Willis
France	Lenroot	Pomerene

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand the amendment now pending is the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out the tariff duty on shingles. I was not able to be present when the Senate met, being engaged at a hearing before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. President, the situation with reference to this amendment, so far as the committee hearings are concerned, is rather peculiar. Shingles are on the free list at the present time. In the hearings before the House committee I have not been able to find any testimony opposing the tariff on shingles. I have also been unable to find any testimony in the hearings before the Finance Committee of the Senate opposing a tariff on shingles. I remember that when our delegation appeared before the Committee on Finance with reference to the tariff on shingles we stated that we did not know whether it was necessary for us to appear or not, because we had not heard of any opposition to the tariff. I have copies of the hearings, but I have not had time to get them together this morning, but it was suggested by one of the members of the committee that if there were no opposition to the tariff on shingles it might not be necessary for us to present any testimony. On page 2131 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance, when Mr. Bergstrom was before the committee urging a tariff on shingles, this colloquy occurred:

> Senator SMOOT. What are you asking for on shingles?
> Mr. BERGSTROM. Fifty cents per thousand.
> Senator SMOOT. That is provided for in the bill.
> Mr. BERGSTROM. Yes.
> Senator SMOOT. That is satisfactory to you?
> Mr. BERGSTROM. That is satisfactory.
> Senator WATSON. Is anybody opposing that?
> Mr. BERGSTROM. I do not know. We were told to appear here.
> Senator SMOOT. We have not heard of any opposition.
> Senator WATSON. I am wondering why you are bolstering up a case that nobody was attacking.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Washington has seen the statement, but when the matter was pending before the House—I do not know whether or not it is a part of the hearings—letters were presented by the American Farm Bureau giving their reasons for opposing any tariff on shingles. I think all of those letters and communications were presented to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been unable to find anything in the House hearings in reference to that matter. At any rate, I am satisfied there were no witnesses before the House committee and no witnesses before the Senate committee in opposition to the tariff on shingles, and we have the statement of one of the members of the committee to that effect. After the statement which I have read was made, however, our delegation appeared before the Finance Committee, and we suggested that we had heard of no opposition and probably it was unnecessary for us to take the time of the committee.

There was no suggestion by any member of the committee at that hearing that anybody had appeared in opposition to the tariff on shingles. So it was a very great surprise to us when the committee reported this amendment.

Of course, Mr. President, I appreciate that this does not affect or go to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Washington mean to say that because nobody appeared in opposition to a tariff on shingles, therefore there is no opposition to such a tariff?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Apparently there is opposition to it, because the Committee on Finance has reported to strike out the provision.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator can find anybody in the Central West who is in favor of a tariff on shingles, I should like to have him pointed out to me, for I have not seen any such person.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not been surveying the Central West to find out whether or not there is anybody there who is in favor of a duty on shingles, so far as that goes. I am sure there are many people there in favor of protection, and I hope they want it generally applied.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if there is any justification for a protective tariff upon any product of this country it lies in the case of shingles. I am looking at the matter from a protection standpoint. I believe in protection; I believe in applying it to the different industries of the country where it is deemed necessary.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Washington has just used an expression which I do not understand. He speaks of this tariff "from a protection standpoint." Does the Senator mean from the standpoint of protection for those who are engaged in the manufacturing of shingles, or does he mean from the standpoint of protection to our forests?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I had in mind the protective principle, which the Senator from Ohio understands, I think, just about as well as I do, although he takes a different position with reference to it; but I hope the Senator will note that part of my argument when I come to it. I think that from the standpoint of the protection of our forests, the conservation of our forests, that we ought to have a protective tariff on shingles. The Senator smiles at that reference, but I shall point out the reason why I say that in a very few moments.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that suggestion does interest me, for if a tariff duty on shingles means that more shingles will be made out of our forest trees, of course that implies the cutting down of more trees. I do not quite understand what the Senator means when he says it is going to protect our forests by cutting them down.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I said "conserve our forests."

Mr. POMERENE. Well, use the word "conservation" then in lieu of "protection," and I am equally interested, for when there is such a great demand for house building all over the country, I do not understand how a tariff on shingles is going to protect the workingman in building a little house for himself, particularly if it is to be covered with shingles.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator illustrates how one may obtain erroneous ideas by not being familiar with the local situation and the local conditions and the way things are done. I think I can convince the Senator in a very few moments that a protective tariff on shingles will conserve our forests and not waste them or destroy them.

First, however, let me speak from the protective-tariff standpoint. The shingle industry is confined very largely to the Pacific coast, and, I might say, very largely to the State of Washington. We produce in that State, as I understand, about two-thirds of all the cedar shingles produced in the United States. Out of a production of between 9,000,000,000 and 10,000,000,000 shingles in this country, the State of Washington produces over 6,000,000,000 shingles. There are employed in the industry many thousands of men and many millions of dollars are invested. In the past many shingle mills have been in operation in the production of shingles to supply the demand in this country. Since the present law was enacted we have had a very striking illustration of the effect of free trade on an industry of this kind. Prior to 1913 we were importing into this country comparatively a small number of shingles. I have the figures as to imports here. In 1913 we imported 560,000,000 shingles into the country. Then shingles were put on the free list. There has been much contention with reference to the various amendments of the pending bill on the ground that the imports do not show any reason for protection, and I confess, Mr. President, that in many cases the argument appealed quite strongly to me that there did not seem to be, from the standpoint of imports, need for a protective tariff; but that argument can not be made with reference to this particular item. As I have said, in 1913 we imported about 560,000,000 shingles into the country. Shingles were then put on the free list, and in 1918 we imported into this country 1,797,000,000 shingles, or more than three times the importation of 1913. In 1919 we imported into this country 1,987,000,000 shingles, showing a steady increase over 1918. Then in 1920——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator state what kind of shingles those were which were imported? Were any of them cypress or pine shingles?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think they were largely cedar shingles and came to a great extent from British Columbia. In 1920 we imported 1,962,996,000 shingles, and for the year 1921, the figures for that year being the latest which I have, we imported over 2,163,611,000 shingles, or four times the importations of 1913.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, what was the production in this country in 1921?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought I had all of those figures here among my papers, but, not knowing that this question was coming up so promptly this morning, I have not had time to arrange them. My recollection is, however, that the production in this country is the same as it was in 1913, or possibly a little less than that. The production in this country is in round numbers, as I understand, nine billion or ten billion shingles annually. Mr. President, that is exactly what we said would occur if shingles were placed on the free list.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Answering the question of the Senator from South Dakota, I have not the figures for 1921, but the production in this country altogether had fallen from 14,907,371,000 in 1909 down to 9,453,000,000 in 1919, and in the State of Washington alone the production had fallen from 8,879,000,000 in 1909 down to 6,133,000,000 in 1919.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was my recollection in a general way with reference to the figures. In other words, what we urged in 1913 when the Simmons-Underwood tariff bill was pending has come to pass.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If I may supplement what I just said by a comparison with British Columbia, operating under free trade in shingles, while the manufacture of shingles was declining in the United States as shown by the figures which I have just stated, it was increasing in British Columbia from 725,000,000 in 1908 to 2,412,000,000 in 1919.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Over 2,100,000,000 of which came into this country. In other words, the increase in the production in British Columbia has simply kept pace with or, rather, measured the imports into this country, and the importations into this country measure very largely the decrease in the production in this country, and that measures the decrease in the employment in the mills of this country, and very largely in the State of Washington.

Mr. President, if a more striking example of the effects of free trade and of protection can be given, I should like to hear it mentioned. We have seen in our State the actual effects of free trade in this article. Many of our shingle mills have been closed. The men in those shingle mills have been thrown out of employment or have gone into some other class of employment.

I had this matter brought to my personal attention a little over a year ago. I was out in the State. I went up to Blaine, a town just on the border. You go on the street there, and you look up the bay, and you see British Columbia. The people took me down to the railroad yard and pointed out a long train of cars headed toward British Columbia. They called my attention to the fact that these were empty cars going to British Columbia. They said, "In a very few days, two or three days, these cars will come back to this country loaded with British Columbia shingles." They took me to the shingle mills in Blaine and they were idle. They were closed down. Their fires were out. Nothing was being done. They called my attention to the smokestacks of similar mills just across the line, up the bay, and they said, "Those are Canadian shingle mills, and they are running day and night."

Mr. SMITH and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield, and to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows the difference in the cost of production on the Canadian side as compared with the cost of production on the American side?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going into that in just a little bit. There is a dispute about it.

Mr. SMITH. While I am on my feet, I want to ask the Senator what is the character of the timber used in the production of shingles? Is the timber that they use available for construction purposes other than shingles in case the price is more advantageous for lumber of other kinds?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; the cedar tree makes the shingle, and many other things are made out of the cedar tree.

Mr. SMITH. The reason I ask that question is that from the date the Senator indicated, say from 1914 on up to the latter part of 1920, construction lumber reached phenomenally high prices, and in my section of the country it was not profitable to convert into shingles any kind of timber that was available for construction purposes, and the scarcity of shingles became so great and the price so high, by virtue of its being more profitable to use the timber for other purposes, that for the first time in the history of my State and of the adjoining State of North Carolina, of which I have knowledge, we got tremendous importations from the State of Washington. Shingles were hauled in there by the millions, coming through the canal; and I was informed that in the Senator's State the mills used a kind of refuse that does not lend itself readily to use as construction lumber, but is available for shingle purposes, and that the mills could produce them so cheaply that they could send them all the way down to the South Atlantic States and sell them in competition with the shingles produced in the South to such an extent as practically to drive them out of the market.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going just a little bit later on to go into the subject of the timber that we have and the product that is available for the production of shingles. We have used, to some extent, waste material. That is, many years ago lots of our cedar was cut very high above the ground, and as the necessity for shingles grew and the price enhanced these stumps have been blown up and cut up into shingle bolts and converted into shingles; but that is not the whole thing at all. We produce just as good shingles as are produced anywhere else and we use for that purpose a great deal of timber that might under some circumstances be used for other purposes; but we use it in a conservative sort of way, and the peculiar methods that we have of lumbering, because of the scattered character of the cedar trees, result actually in conservation if we will give the proper encouragement to the production of shingles in this country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to say, for the information of the Senator from South Carolina, that that process of using stumps for the manufacture of shingles has very largely come to an end by reason of the exhaustion of the available material of that kind, and that at the present time, according to figures which I have received this morning from the most reliable sources, the difference between the United States and Canada in the cost of the material out of which the shingles are manufactured makes a differential in the neighborhood of 75 cents a thousand in favor of British Columbia, on account of the cheaper material that they have.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it is contended that the cost of production is lower in this country than it is in British Columbia. Various figures are presented to establish that contention. Figures have been presented on both sides. Our lumber people, our shingle people deny this contention very strenuously and they present their reasons for it.

The Tariff Commission have made a survey of some character, and they seem to take the position that the actual production cost in this country is a little bit lower than in British Columbia; but this conclusion is based upon various assumptions that, it seems to me, are absolutely unwarranted, and there are just one or two facts that, it seems to me, are conclusive against any such contention as that.

In the first place, it is admitted by the Tariff Commission that orientals are very largely employed in the shingle mills in Canada. They are not employed at all in the shingle mills in the State of Washington. Everybody knows that the oriental works cheaper than the white man. It is contended that he is not as efficient; yet there was one mill started in British Columbia where they employed all white men at the start, but in a very short while they changed them to all orientals. It seems to me that is conclusive that it was found more profitable to employ orientals in the production of shingles than it was to employ white people.

Then there is another fact that must not be overlooked, and that is this: During the war the lumber industry in the Northwest was practically forced upon an 8-hour basis. The Government said to our people, "You must produce your lumber of all sorts upon an 8-hour workday basis," and we went on that basis. We are on that basis now. In British Columbia they work on the basis of 9 and 10 hours a day. All the figures that may be brought here can not convince me that they produce cheaper on the basis of an 8-hour workday than they do on the basis of a 9 or 10 hour workday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere unnecessarily in the argument of the Senator; but there is one statement made by the Tariff Commission that I wish to call to the attention of the Senator, not with any view of embarrassing his argument at all, but in order that he may, if he is able to do so, answer the statement.

In the survey with reference to shingles, on page 573, under the head of "Competitive conditions," this statement is made by the Tariff Commission:

> There is active competition between shingle producers in Washington and British Columbia. Costs of production are about the same, American producers having an advantage in some respects and Canadian producers in others. In both regions there is great difference in the costs of production among individual mills.

I simply desired to call that to the attention of the Senator in connection with the argument which he is now making.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I have some suggestions with reference to the Tariff Survey that I am going to refer to in just a moment. That, at any rate, is a very general statement. I can not see that there is anything there that is very conclusive one way or the other. That applies to the general proposition. The general results we know. The general situation we know. We know that oriental labor is very largely employed in the Canadian mills. We know that it is not employed in our mills. We know that the Canadian mills run very largely, if not entirely, upon a 9 and 10 hour a day basis. Our people run upon an 8-hour basis, forced there by the Government. We know that the importations of Canadian shingles into this country since 1913 have increased more than 400 per cent, and we know that as those increases have been made our production has decreased almost identically with the amount of shingles imported into this country. That seems to me to be conclusive proof that the Canadians, by reason of their longer hours per day and their cheaper labor and better conditions, are able to compete in our own markets and drive out our people.

During the last few years many of our shingle mills have gone into the hands of cooperative companies or associations, and I hope Senators will take this into account. Many of the shingle mills have gone into the hands of the former employees, who have taken them over, and they are working them now upon a cooperative basis.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Is not this a large factor to be considered: The cedar from which the shingles are made in British Columbia comes from Crown lands, public domain, and the party operating the mill can buy that lumber without any particular capital investment simply by paying royalty, whereas in Washington, Oregon, and other States the lands are privately owned and subject to taxation, and there is a very large interest charge on the capital investment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true. Here is a telegram from Marysville, Wash., and I hope the Senators will pay attention to it. It is very significant to me as a protectionist, and our labor people should give it consideration. It reads:

> When tariff was taken off shingles in 1913 manufacturers cut wages. Said they had to because of British Columbia Chinese competition. Forty-one of us shingle weavers did not believe it, and started a cooperative mill. We believe it now. Except for the war period have operated at a loss.
> ROYAL CEDAR COOPERATE SHINGLE CO.

These men took the same position in 1913 which many of our people take to-day, that our people can produce shingles just as cheaply as the manufacturers in British Columbia can. When shingles were put on the free list, and the manufacturers said, "We are going to cut wages; we have to do it in order to compete with British Columbia shingle producers," these laborers said, "That is not the reason for the reduction in wages." They said, "It is not necessary; we can produce them just as cheaply in this country as they can abroad." Finally these men organized their association and took over a shingle mill. They went to producing shingles, and they have had it demonstrated to them that production is more expensive in this country than it is abroad. They say, "We can not produce them so cheaply here." They are absolutely convinced; they know.

I have a letter here from the Duncan Shingle & Lumber Co., which answers many of the objections which are made to the tariff on shingles, and I am going to read it. I personally do not profess to know very much about the shingle industry, so I have to present what those who are engaged in the business know about it. They say:

We are taking the liberty of addressing you in reference to the proposed tariff of 50 cents per 1,000 on red cedar shingles in the tariff bill which is now under your consideration.

In the first place, we may state for your information that we are among the largest, and possibly the largest, distributers of high-grade red cedar shingles in the United States. We wish to go on record as most emphatically in favor of the proposed duty of at least 50 cents per 1,000 on red cedar shingles.

Our extensive experience in marketing red cedar shingles has shown us clearly the following facts (in referring in this letter to American shingles, we mean red cedar shingles produced in Oregon and Washington):

That there are many more high-grade shingles produced in Oregon and Washington than in British Columbia.

It is contended by some that the British Columbia shingles compete with our shingles in this country because they are a higher grade shingle. Our people deny that most emphatically. There are high-grade shingles produced in British Columbia; and there are high-grade shingles produced in this country, shingles of just as high grade as those produced in British Columbia, and some of our people contend that the highest grade in this country is even better than the highest grade in British Columbia. But this company says that there are more high-grade shingles produced in Oregon and Washington than in British Columbia. I read further:

That the best grades of American shingles are sold in competition with the best grades of British Columbia XXXXX shingles and usually sell for the same price.

They must sell for the same price. The British Columbia shingle comes into this country, and our people must meet the price. This letter further states:

That a number of American shingle manufacturers make shingles that are superior in every way to the very best British Columbia shingles.

That far more complaints are made by the retail trade on XXXXX British Columbia shingles than on similar grades of American shingles, although British Columbia manufacturers have for years claimed that British Columbia shingles, per se, are superior to American shingles.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think anyone would question the quality of the shingles produced by the State of Washington; I think they are the equal of any shingle produced anywhere. The State of Washington produces not only high-grade shingles but high-grade Senators as well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is very kind of the Senator from Ohio, I am sure. I am glad especially to have his commendation of the Washington shingles, because it has been contended on this floor, and I have no doubt will be contended, that one of the main reasons why Canadian shingles have been imported so largely into this country is that they are better shingles than we produce; but, as the Senator from Ohio has said, they can not surpass the shingle produced in Washington. I continue reading:

In this connection we quote from a letter written by one of our representatives in Detroit, Mich., Mr. Eugene R. Chandler, under date of February 10, as follows:

"I used to sell a lot of BC–5X, but since those mills over there have lowered the grade so badly they are now no better than the common clears and not half so good as the Rite-Grade."

Under date of February 20, Mr. Chandler wrote to us as follows:

"I used to sell a great many 5X from several good mills in British Columbia, but of late I have been obliged to cut them off entirely on account of poor grade, so at this time it is very hard to get a decent car of 5X from British Columbia. It is for this very reason of their manhandling my orders and shipping poor stock that I have decided to sell your stock as far as possible, as I really believe the mills you represent are of the very best on the coast."

(We are sending Mr. Chandler's original letters, from which the above quotations are taken, to the Hon. MILES POINDEXTER.)

This is the method pursued:

That when there is an oversupply of shingles the British Columbia manufacturers use this country as a dumping ground, selling their product below American shingles at prices lower than the cost of producing American shingles, thus forcing the American manufacturers to either sell their product below cost or to close their mills, thereby throwing hundreds of Americans out of employment.

That no oriental labor is employed in the American shingle mills, but that a large percentage of the labor used in the British Columbia mills is cheap oriental labor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, does the Senator contend that there is no oriental labor employed by the shingle makers of Washington or Oregon?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know and have never heard of any oriental labor being employed in the shingle mills of the State of Washington.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that the percentage is just exactly as great as it is in Canada?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not a fact.

Mr. KELLOGG. I insist that it is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not a fact, if I can believe the shingle producers of my State. I have not visited all the mills, but I have visited many and have seen no orientals.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I had information from a very reliable shingle manufacturer of the State of Washington only a few weeks ago, who said he had made special inquiry and examination as to whether there was any oriental labor employed in the shingle mills of Washington, and he could not find a single oriental employed in the shingle mills of that State.

Mr. KELLOGG. The same shingle mills have been representing here that their shingle mills are closed, when to-day they are running at full blast; in fact, many of them with double shifts.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Some of them may be, but all of them are not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The great percentage of them are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A very large percentage of them are closed. I do not think the Senator from Minnesota knows any more about that than I do. I know many were closed last year. Our action should be determined by the situation of the years and not as to any particular time——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am speaking generally, now, and not because of any special knowledge of the rate of wages paid in the shingle business; but, generally speaking, the wages in Canada in a given industry are substantially the same as the wages in the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true as to the wages of white people.

Mr. POMERENE. When the Senator speaks of the oriental labor in Canada, he has in mind, of course, the Japanese?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Chinese and Hindoos.

Mr. POMERENE. Japanese particularly, I think, though there may be some Hindoos. I have been informed by Americans who have very large manufacturing interests in Japan that they always estimate, in making their contracts, that the Japanese labor is one-third less efficient than American labor, and I do not believe there is any doubt about it. I think an investigation of the subject will show that the oriental labor employed in the shingle mills in Canada is one-third less efficient than our labor here in the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, here is a statement bearing on that very point:

In 1913 the Westminster Mill Co. built what was then claimed to be the best shingle mill in British Columbia. The plant is located at New Westminster. The Westminster Mill Co. hired an entire crew of American sawyers and a filer away from the Case Shingle & Lumber Co., of Raymond, Wash. Within six months every one of these American workmen, except the filer, were replaced by Chinese.

Why were they replaced? There is only one answer, that on the whole they were more beneficial to the employer. In other words, he made more money by employing the Chinese than he did by employing the white people. It does not seem to me there is any answer to that. Of course, I know it has been long contended that the oriental labor is not as efficient as the white labor, and it may be true that it is not as efficient, and yet, taken in the aggregate, considering the amount of money expended in this employment, it is more productive for the employer than white labor. That is the situation in British Columbia.

This company goes on in its letter:

That owing to this cheap labor, the cost of manufacturing British Columbia shingles is considerably below the cost of manufacturing similar grades of American shingles.

Mr. President, figures can be produced to sustain both sides of this contention, I grant. Figures will be sent here by reputable men and reputable firms endeavoring to show that the cost of production in this country is lower than it is in Canada, and so on. But it seems to me that as a Republican, as believing in the principle of protection and its application to the industries of this country, I should resolve any doubt I might have in favor of the American industry, the American laborer, and the American investor. So, granting the doubtful character of the proof submitted on both sides with reference to cost of production, I consider it my duty to favor a duty upon shingles in the interest of the American industry. I think the fact is very clear, as far as that is concerned, that the cost of production is less in Canada than in this country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement just made by the Senator that figures could be produced on both sides—somewhat like some preachers, who can interpret a text from the Bible in different ways—permit me to call the Senator's attention to a statement here which seems to me to be the product of extensive investigation, and by a dispassionate body, which therefore can not be challenged, even by the able Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I challenge it very emphatically.

Mr. KING. May I call the Senator's attention to it and put it in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. KING. On page 54 of the Tariff Survey, speaking of shingles, the Tariff Commission says:

> Average prices for 1920 for the most important grades were obtained from several sources and averaged. The prices finally adopted were as follows, all prices being per 1,000: For the United States, perfection, $8.39.

The corresponding price in British Columbia was $8.82. The cost was higher.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That says "price." It does not say "cost."

Mr. KING. The prices at which they were sold. The perfects were $8.22 in the United States, and the price of the corresponding article in British Columbia was $8.10. In the United States the clears were $6.04, and in Canada they were $6.04. No. 2 Eureka were, in the United States, $6.96, and in Canada, $8.10. So, taking the prices of the various grades, it would appear that they were higher in Canada than they were in the United States. The commission further says:

> As determined by the above process, the total cost per 1,000 was found to be for American mills $4.77 and for British Columbia $5.04.

That includes log cost, manufacture cost, depreciation, and marketing, but not interest on investment. So that taking into account the cost of production, it would appear that the advantage is on this side of the Canadian line.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to ask the Senator, then, why importations have been increasing so largely and why our production has been decreasing, if that is true?

Mr. KING. I ought to say in fairness that these figures were for the year 1920. In 1921 there had been many disturbing factors in the United States as well as in some other parts of the world. So that we can not fairly and justly predicate any rate on conditions of the past year. The Senator knows that many strikes occurred during the past year, and my information is that they invaded the beautiful State from which the Senator comes. They have had labor troubles there, and because of labor troubles and cessation of production there would be manifestly an increased importation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator has answered the tariff survey contention. I shall refer to that just a little bit later.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator whether or not there was not a shortage of raw material during 1920 and 1921 owing to lack of demand for fir lumber?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That I do not know. Of course, shingles are not made out of fir.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but, as I understand, in Washington particularly the cedar runs about 20 per cent of the total fir cut, and it is more or less of a by-product. When the fir is being cut there is a free supply of shingle material. When the fir is not cut there is a shortage of shingle material.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That might affect it to some extent. That might be true. But is it fair, is it in accordance with the principles of the Republican policy of protection, that every doubt shall be resolved against us, that every untoward circumstance shall be resolved against the application of the principle of protection? I do not think so. I think it ought to be just the reverse of that.

Furthermore, I have given figures of importations covering four or five years and showing the steady increase of importations and the steady increase of the production in British Columbia and their imports into this country. My colleague put in the record data showing a steady decline of production in this country to correspond with those imports.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Washington a question, if I may do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. More or less has been said about the importation of shingles into this country. Does the Senator know whether we have exported any shingles?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think we have exported some, but I have not the figures.

Mr. HALE. I have the figures given by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be glad to have the Senator place them in the record.

Mr. KELLOGG. We have exported a good many shingles.

Mr. HALE. We imported during the year 1920 shingles to the value of $11,260,000. We exported during the same time shingles to the value of $35,491. If there is any advantage that we have in this country over Canada, it would seem to me there would have been a greater exportation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That would seem reasonable.

Mr. HALE. Conditions in my section of the country are possibly not the same as in the West, but in 1909 we produced 559,000,000 shingles in Maine. Since shingles have been put on the free list we now produce about 140,000,000, or only about one-fourth of what we formerly produced.

One of the items involved, which has not been mentioned, I think, is the question of stumpage. I have ascertained from people in my State some facts about the stumpage which they have to pay on cedar. In Canada the ordinary price of stumpage is $2.70 per 1,000 on cedar. During the winter of 1921–22 this price went down to $1.40 for cedar. At the same time in my State we were paying $5, $6, and even as high as $7 for cedar stumpage. That is certainly an advantage that Canada has over us in the cost of production.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was about to call attention to this fact. I remember that when the Payne-Aldrich law was under consideration in the Senate there was a great controversy over the lumber schedule. I remember that the leading lumber people from my State, as well as other sections of the West and of the South, were here urging a tariff on lumber, urging it very strenuously.

What is the situation now? The situation now is that the men who were here then most strongly urging a tariff on lumber are not specially interested at the present time. I know one man in particular, a man of the very highest character and standing and integrity, who was one of the leading men here when the Payne-Aldrich law was before the Senate, as well as when the Underwood-Simmons law was up for consideration, who was at that time urging a tariff on lumber. He is not urging it now. He frankly says why. There is no concealment upon his part as to his change of attitude. Why is it? It is because he has invested largely in British Columbia timber. That is true of many of our timber people. They have their investments on the other side of the line, and so they are indifferent as to a tariff. They catch it coming and going.

But the small shingle-mill owner, the cooperative associations to which I have referred, the laboring men who have taken over the shingle mills and, as mutual associations, are trying to run them, do not own shingle timber across the line in British Columbia, and so they are vitally interested with reference to the maintenance of the American industry. I venture to say that many of the American companies, the American people interested in lumber, who are urging free trade in shingles and free trade in lumber are doing it because they are not only interested in timber in this country but they have large holdings across the line in British Columbia.

How do the British Columbia people regard this action of the committee in putting shingles on the free list? I have here a clipping from the Vancouver (B. C.) Sun of March 18, 1922, and this is what they say:

> British Columbia shingles are placed on the free list in the new United States tariff bill by the Senate Finance Committee, which is working on the measure, according to advices received here from Washington yesterday by the Shingle Association of British Columbia.

They have had their representatives down here. There is no question about that. They are keeping closely advised as to what is being done.

> The House bill had a duty of 50 cents on shingles. With this exception the provisions of the bill are retained and all finished lumber will go into the United States free.
> Although this is only the first round in the big fight against a duty being placed on British Columbia lumber and shingles entering the United States, as the bill must go before the Senate and the House of Representatives, yet the lumber interests of this city were jubilant yesterday. They prophesy that similar action will be taken at the next two crossings the bill has to make.
> The fight started about a year and a half ago, and has been continued ever since the first effort was made by the lumber and shingle interests of the Western States to prevent Canadian lumber competing in the United States markets.
> The Washington Government has not been very affectionately inclined toward the Western States lumber concerns recently, however, as was evidenced by the action for investigation of charges against the Western Pine Association and the West Coast Lumber Association of restraint of trade and fixed prices.

To the shingle trade of British Columbia alone the duty of 50 cents a thousand on shingles would have meant 50 cents per thousand on 2,000,000,000 shingles or $1,000,000 a year in duty alone. Last year this Province shipped about 2,000,000,000 shingles to the United States, or 85 per cent of the entire pack.

Now, Mr. President, it does not seem to me, in the face of that situation, that we should require very much argument in favor of the application to this industry of the Republican policy of protection.

I have here an analysis of the Tariff Commission's survey, prepared by the American shingle manufacturers. As the tariff survey, of course, has been referred to, and very naturally and very properly so, I am going to read this analysis, made by men who know the business, who know the situation, who can speak intelligently, and who can point out the errors made in the tariff survey. It reads:

From: American shingle manufacturers.
To: United States Tariff Commission.
Subject: Tariff Information Surveys, FL–37 (shingles).

That is the survey which has been read from here on the floor during the discussion.

GENTLEMEN: During consideration of pending tariff bill by the Finance Committee of the Senate, your commission transmitted a report to said committee on the red-cedar shingle industry, wherein you specifically admit that certain vital conclusions of your survey were predicated on "assumptions" and "not entirely correct," but alleging that the hypothesis is sufficiently near the truth to afford a fairly satisfactory basis of comparison." (See par. 3 of p. 54, Tariff Information Surveys, FL–37.)

Without desiring to be intentionally unkind or discourteous, the American shingle industry—or, to be exact, 72 per cent thereof—after careful analysis of said report, is compelled to go on record to the effect that the only accurate essential information contained therein was footnote at the bottom of page 60, subsequently eliminated in a correction letter from your commission, dated February 20, 1922, in which letter you advise that this footnote "was included by mistake."

The report is too inconceivably inaccurate and misleading to be permitted to go unchallenged by an American industry to which it does a grave injustice. It should not be allowed to become a matter of permanent Government record.

The purpose of this communication is to point out the errors of the report, ask its withdrawal pending further investigation, and to say to you that if you will grant this petition a committee of practical and experienced shingle manufacturers will, if permitted, confer with you or your representatives as to methods of determining costs in accordance with correct accounting practice instead of "assumption," at the same time placing before you definite records of actual sales which will enable you to correctly determine average selling prices.

Specifically, the American shingle industry's petition for the withdrawal and correction of your report is based on the following reasons:

I ask the attention of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to this, because I know he wants to be fair:

1. Your hasty and superficial survey was conducted for the year 1920, which period was characterized in all business by chaotic, abnormal conditions wholly adverse to correct or intelligent analysis essential in determining facts as a basis for tariff legislation.

There is exactly the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah himself for the opposite contention.

2. Your report has given certain Senators the erroneous impression that oriental-made shingles of British Columbia sell, grade for grade, at a higher price in American markets than American-made shingles. Your assumption in this respect was not within $1.27 per 1,000 for the correct and actual 1920 sales on Perfections; was not within $2.61 per 1,000 on Perfects; was not within $1.39 per 1,000 on Eurekas; was not within $1.21 per 1,000 of the correct price for Clears. In other grades we find proportionate discrepancies.

3. You say, "The grade of shingle produced in British Columbia averages distinctly higher than that produced in Washington-Oregon."

In reality there are more high-grade shingles produced in Oregon and Washington than in Canada.

4. You say, "It was assumed that a shingle was of a higher grade either because it consumed more material or required logs of better quality, and that a consequent difference in log costs would be reflected in a difference in price. It did not seem probable that the labor and other costs would be greatly different, shingle for shingle."

Difference in log cost reflects in cost of manufacture, but not necessarily in price. It is the history of the red-cedar shingle industry that the selling price of lower grades frequently approaches the price of higher grades, and vice versa, in response to the law of supply and demand.

As to its "not seeming probable that labor and other costs would be greatly different, shingle for shingle," for the very period covered in your survey the labor alone, in sawing and packing Perfection shingles, was 7 cents per 1,000 more than the sawing and packing of Clears. Shingle for shingle, there is a material difference in labor cost.

5. Your report shows that the 5–2 Dimension shingle sold in 1920 for 38 cents less than Clears. This is the one instance where there is a fixed price differential between grades, the Clear grade being the base for 5–2 Dimension, which latter at no time in the past 10 years has sold for less than $1 over the price of Clears, instead of 38 cents under, as you assume.

6. Your report quotes a grade of Stars at an average price of $4.67—

I should like to have the Senator from Utah note this statement. This is a criticism of the survey report, pointing out the errors in it:

There is no such grade; and actual records fail to reveal any such price. There is a grade of "A," to which your report assigns an average price of $4.86, whereas the actual sales as of that year show an average of $3.89.

Which is correct? Somebody, of course, is wrong. These men know the business; they are engaged in it. Of course, it may be said they are interested. That may be true; but I know that some of them are interested not only in this country but in British Columbia.

7. You say: "Oriental labor is employed to a greater extent in the Canadian mills."

There is no oriental labor employed in Oregon and Washington shingle mills. A careful investigation conducted by the shingle grade inspectors of the shingle branch of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association shows that there is not one oriental employed in the shingle mills of Oregon and Washington.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has information to the contrary. I myself do not know. I know many of these men; I know that they are highly reputable and honorable men, and I do not believe they would make a statement of that character if it were not true. I also know that as a general proposition orientals are not employed in the lumber camps and lumber mills and shingle mills in the State of Washington. This company goes so far as to say they have made an investigation and there is not a single oriental employed in any of the shingle mills of Washington and Oregon.

8. You say: "They (orientals) work for somewhat lower wages, but it has been asserted that what is gained in lower wages is lost in greater wastefulness of material."

If oriental labor is so wasteful, why is it the dominating labor in British Columbia shingle mills, when so much white labor is available?

By whom was it asserted? Does a mere assertion justify the erroneous impression you incorporate in an official report and its influence upon important legislation?

In 1913 the Westminster Mill Co. built what was then claimed to be the best shingle mill in British Columbia. The plant is located at New Westminster. The Westminster Mill Co. hired an entire crew of American sawyers and a filer away from the Case Shingle & Lumber Co., of Raymond, Wash. Within six months every one of these American workmen except the filer were replaced by Chinese.

9. You say: "Certainly, so far as the averages shown above are representative, the Canadians have no advantage in labor costs."

American manufacturers are in possession of facts which show, for American and Canadian mills making identical grades, the Canadian sawing and packing labor is:

Sixteen cents per 1,000 lower than like American labor on Perfections.
Thirteen cents per 1,000 lower than like American labor on Eurekas.
Twelve cents per 1,000 lower than like American labor on Perfects.
Nine cents per 1,000 lower than like American labor on Clears.
Nine cents per 1,000 lower than like American labor on "A."

10. Your report shows Canadian Eurekas sold for a 1920 average of $8.10 and American Eurekas $6.95, thereby conveying the impression that the Canadian make sells higher in American markets than the American make. Aside from the obvious error of your figures in both instances, the grades are not comparable. Both are 18-inch shingles, but one is 100 per cent clear and vertical grain, while the other is 90 per cent clear and may contain up to 50 per cent flat grain, together with defects 14 inches or over from the butt.

11. In your table of costs you show American Perfections at $5.89 and American Perfects $5.83, a difference of 6 cents. One thousand feet log scale produces 7,000 Perfection shingles and 9,000 Perfects. Cedar logs in 1920 averaged $27.83; therefore the average raw material cost of Perfections was $3.97 and the same cost for Perfects was $3.09, a difference in raw material alone of 88 cents. Add to that a sawing and packing cost differential of 7 cents per 1,000 higher on Perfections than Perfects and you will understand why American manufacturers complain.

12. You say: "Leading men of the industry are divided on the question of tariff."

If you mean the leading men of the industry in the United States and Canada, or if you mean a few leading men of the American industry having timber or mills in Canada, then you are correct. But if you refer to the leading American shingle manufacturers, you are mistaken.

Below you will find the names and addresses of some 200 leading men in the American shingle industry. If you will take the trouble to write these gentlemen, you will find that there is no division on the subject of tariff other than that one of these gentlemen favors a 30-cent duty, while the rest are divided between 50 cents and 75 cents. The names follow—

Mr. President, I ask that these names be printed along with the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that a certain list of names in the document from which he has been reading may be printed without reading. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am sorry I have taken so much time, but this is an industry of such great importance to my State as well as to other States that I feel I am justified in doing it. As I have said, thousands of men are employed in the shingle industry. These shingle mills are small institutions; they are not great lumber mills like those controlled by associations such as we frequently find in the lumber business and about which so much complaint has been made; but a great percentage of our shingle mills, as I stated a while ago, have gone into the hands of former employees of the mills. They have organized mutual associations to operate and handle these mills among themselves. The testimony given by them shows that they are not able to compete with the Canadian interests across the line. These mills are now being closed; men are being thrown out of employment; we are losing our market and the industry is going down.

It is urged that we should have no tariff on shingles in the interest of the conservation of our forests. The Senator from Ohio (Mr. POMERENE) is not now present; he has been called out of the Chamber. He made the suggestion as to conservation, and seemed to be rather incredulous when I suggested that a tariff on shingles is in the interest of the conservation of our timber resources. I will tell Senators why I say that. The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. LENROOT) a moment ago suggested the reason. He brought out the fact that throughout our forests only a small percentage of the timber consists of cedar from which shingles are made, and stated that cedar amounted to about 20 per cent of the total timber. I doubt if the percentage is that great. The cedar trees are scattered throughout the forests. When the fir is cut we should also cut or harvest the cedar, for when the fir trees fail they break the cedars, and in many instances practically destroy them. Unless the cedar trees are then worked up into shingles in some way they are practically lost. If the shingle industry is not in such condition as to warrant the manufacture of the cedar trees into shingles, which, as the Senator from Wisconsin has stated are a sort of a by-product incident to the harvesting of the fir forests, then we shall lose that much lumber; we lose that much of our forests which we fail to conserve. In other words, Mr. President, if by a tariff we so encourage the shingle industry in this country that the cedar trees and the cedar logs shall be made use of along with the fir trees as they are cut down, then we conserve our forests just to that extent. If the shingle industry is not prospering, if it is not possible to use the cedar timber, to cut cedar trees and logs up into shingle bolts and manufacture them into shingles, then we shall have failed to conserve our forests just to that extent. This is real conservation.

The Canadian situation is a little different, as I understand. As I am advised, the cedar timber in Canada is largely in a more compact body than in our country; in other words, there is not a forest of fir with a few cedar trees scattered through it, but a cedar forest which may be harvested as a cedar forest. That, of course, is a very great advantage. The result, Mr. President, of encouraging the shingle industry in this country is to make available for the shingle market not only the cedar and shingle timber of British Columbia but the shingle timber of the United States as well. So we serve a double purpose in encouraging the development of the shingle industry. Not only do we employ American labor and American capital, but we conserve the American timber and the American forests.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation in urging a Republican Senate and a Republican Congress to place a tariff upon shingles. It will not increase the price of shingles to the farmer or to the home builder in this country, because there is active competition among the shingle producers of the United States. There is no great organized trust or combination or association that will hold up prices, but there are hundreds of different shingle manufacturing organizations in my State alone actively in competition with each other, and they will keep the price down just as low as competition can keep it. The clipping from the Vancouver Sun, of British Columbia, would indicate that taking the tariff off of shingles simply means a million dollars a year in the pockets of the British Columbia shingle producers and that much out of the revenues of the United States, and that is according to the Republican contention with reference to the application of the principle of protection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to say that there will be the same amount of imports with a 50-cent duty as there is now, does he?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The duty might reduce the imports, but there would still be imports.

Mr. LENROOT. If the imports were the same the tariff would not do the shingle factories in the Senator's State any good, would it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly not, but of course I hope the tariff will reduce the importation of shingles into this country. It will not prevent importations entirely. Over 500,000,000 shingles came into this country in 1913 under the duty then provided by law. However, Mr. President, to impose a tariff on shingles does not mean that the home consumer of shingles will pay an increased price any more than it means that when we put a tariff on various other articles throughout this bill. If I thought that was true I would vote against this tariff bill; I would vote against the various proposals that are made here; but it is not true; it is contrary to the practice and experience of our people in the past. The imposition of a tariff duty on an article in this bill does not mean at all that the cost of production of that article is increased in this country, and it does not mean that the cost of the article will be increased to the consumer, except possibly under certain conditions.

If we place a tariff upon an article that is controlled in this country by a combination or by a monopoly, then it may be possible for that controlling monopoly to raise the price; but, Mr. President, I will not knowingly vote for the imposition of a tariff upon a product in this country that is controlled by a monopoly. I will largely take the judgment of the committee, and I may unwittingly vote for such a tariff, but I will not knowingly do it.

It has been suggested, and the argument with reference to the application of these duties in the consideration of this bill seems to proceed on the theory, or at any rate gives out the impression to the country, that every rate of duty that we impose upon articles in this bill is added to the cost of the article and must be paid by the consumer. That is not true. As I say, it is not added, and it can not be added in any case except possibly where it is controlled by a monopoly. It is the Republican belief and the Republican contention that the competition among home producers will keep down the price, and that it is stabilized and maintained in a better way by reason of import duties than if the foreign producers are allowed to dump their products freely into this country, as it is said here by these manufacturers that the Canadians dump their shingles upon the markets in this country and depress the price, and when our production falls off and the demand increases their prices go up, and they recoup themselves for whatever reductions they have made, which reductions have been made at the expense of the American producer.

Mr. President, I favor this tariff on shingles in the interest of American labor and American industry and in the interest of real, genuine conservation and as a proper application of the Republican doctrine of protection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to take only a moment in indicating to the Senate the reasons that justified the committee in reporting in favor of placing shingles upon the free list.

There are two important reasons. The first and most important of all, and one which reaches into the question of the free importation of all building material, and especially lumber, is that of the cost of producing and marketing in the competing countries. We were supported in our view by the report of the Tariff Commission. This commission made a very exhaustive research into costs and prices, both in Canada and in the United States, and their final conclusion was that taking each one of the grades of shingles produced in the United States and in Canada, the cost was substantially the same. In fact, they found that the Canadian cost was a little in excess of the American cost; but for all purposes of argument we may assume that the costs of producing shingles in the United States and in Canada are substantially the same.

Mr. President, I am going to ask permission to put into the RECORD the marked portions of the report of the Tariff Commission upon the several grades of shingles produced in the United States in this pamphlet from page 54 to page 60, inclusive. This will cover a series of tables showing the cost of production in the two countries, and, in addition thereto, showing exports, imports, and many other items of important consideration. They are epitomized in that statement, and to conserve space I shall ask that it be printed instead of discussing it at any particular length. It shows conclusively that the cost of production is practically the same in the two countries.

That, however, would not affect me to any great extent, provided there were nothing else to be taken into consideration in the matter of the importation of shingles and lumber from Canada. In considering that subject, however, we are led immediately to the question of the conservation of our own forests. Either luckily or unluckily, I am the owner of some very choice timber tracts in Oregon, some of the finest in the world; and as I look at those great trees, some of which started in their course of life before Moses began to write upon the mountains, and as I look at their great trunks, straight as an arrow, kissing the very skies, and think of the acres and acres of that fine timber, and then contemplate the hundreds, aye, the thousands of years that nature has taken to produce those trees, and then glance for a moment on the sides of the hills in Oregon and see where the fire has swept through where there have been brushings and cuttings and where we have denuded the forests, and see nothing but great black stumps pointing skyward, preaching the lesson of exhaustion of these great forests, I can not help but admit that it does influence me to some extent in favor of conservation.

My early life was spent in Minnesota. I knew something about their vast forests; and as we now go through the old stumpage and see nothing but willows and poplars, and very few of the old pine trees, and consider that nothing has been done to reforest, and I doubt if anything could be done, I am inclined to protect our American forests as much as possible.

It is a little different where we are considering an article which can be produced in the year 1922 and harvested and put upon the market, and the same product can be produced again in 1923 and harvested and put upon the market. There is some justification for protection there, and I should be in favor of protection even though possibly we could manufacture or produce as cheaply as in Canada if I found that the industry really needed the assistance; but I find that the Canadian shingles in some qualities are selling for a higher price than the very best American shingles. I do not think they can produce any better shingles than we can produce in the United States; but when you take a splendid American shingle and, in order to save a little or perhaps save considerable in the cost of the freight, you put it through a drying kiln that takes all of the sap out of it in a very few days, you have injured the shingle to some extent—at least, experts so think—and therefore they are willing to pay a higher price for the Canadian product that has not gone through the extensive process of drying that is used so much in the American mills for the purpose of saving freight rates on the excess water in the wood.

Mr. President, I think there is no justification for a tariff on shingles by reason of any difference in the cost of production. It is true that we import a great many more shingles than we export, but our imports are very light compared with our production; and when we take that matter into consideration and further consider the great, important matter of conserving our great timber belts in the United States, I think we are justified in allowing Canada first to denude her country of forests before we entirely destroy all of our own.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain documents which he has described. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COST OF PRODUCTION.

[From tariff information surveys on logs, timber, lumber, and other wood products.]

The commission has collected cost data from mills in British Columbia and in Washington-Oregon. In developing the data collected it was necessary to find some common unit, if the comparison was to be significant.

There are many grades of shingles and the different mills do not produce the same grades in the same proportions. One mill may specialize on a high grade, another on a low grade. This is true of competing mills in the same region, and is especially true between British Columbia as a whole and the Washington-Oregon region as a whole. The grade of shingle produced in British Columbia averages distinctly higher than that produced in Washington-Oregon. To compare the average cost of producing a "shingle," irrespective of grade, would be obviously unfair.

The method adopted in this report was based on the assumption that the log cost of production varied with the grade of shingle as shown by its average market price. It was assumed that a shingle was of a higher grade, either because it consumed more material or required logs of a better quality, and that a consequent difference in log cost would be reflected in a difference in price. It did not seem probable that the labor and other costs would be greatly different shingle for shingle. The assumption is not strictly accurate. Probably the expense both for labor and overhead was somewhat greater in the case of mills producing high-grade shingle. Some mills, indeed, made returns of wage scales showing a higher rate for sawyers of "Perfection," for example, than for other shingles. It is believed, however, that the hypothesis is sufficiently near to the truth to afford a fairly satisfactory basis of comparison.

COMPARISON BY GRAPHICAL METHOD.

The above comparison by averages shows the cost to be slightly greater in British Columbia than in Washington-Oregon—$5.04 per 1,000 as compared with $4.77. Conclusions from this result should, however, be made with caution. In the first place, the mills, while believed to be fairly representative, by no means cover the whole industry. For Washington-Oregon returns were received from 37 mills, with a production of 1,559,669 thousand shingles out of a total production for the whole region of 4,847,105 thousand—about 32 per cent. For British Columbia returns were received from 15 mills, with a production of 1,300,357 thousand out of a total production of 2,412,000 thousand—about 54 per cent. The costs for individual mills vary so widely that the inclusion of all the mills might have affected the result considerably. Finally, both costs and prices in 1920 were abnormal. While both British Columbia and Washington-Oregon were affected by the abnormal conditions, it is possible that one region was more affected than the other.

The real situation is shown much more accurately by the two accompanying diagrams (Figs. 5 and 6). Here the costs (reduced to clears by the method above described) are shown mill by mill. It will be seen that some mills in Washington manufacture at a much less cost than many mills in British Columbia, and that some mills in British Columbia manufacture at a much less cost than many mills in Washington-Oregon. The condition is similar to that described in connection with the lumber industry on a preceding page.

INCREASE IN COST OF PRODUCTION.

The following table shows the cost of producing shingles in 1914 and 1915 in several typical mills in western Washington:

[2] 6 months.

Comparing these costs with those shown for 1920—labor $1.15, logs $2.90, other $0.72; total $4.77—it is seen that the total cost was nearly three times as great in 1920 as in 1914. During the present year (1921) there has been a sharp decline in both costs and prices.

LABOR.

Pay rolls were obtained from several mills. So far as these are typical, they indicate that the prevailing opinion is correct—that a larger percentage of oriental labor is employed in British Columbia than in Washington-Oregon and at a lower wage. One mill showed an average rate of 33 cents per 1,000 for white sawyers and 29 cents per 1,000 for Chinese. Another showed 36.7 cents for white and 30.5 cents for Chinese. The difference in wage rate per 1,000 does not, however, necessarily represent the difference in labor cost. It is claimed by some managers that oriental labor is more wasteful of material. Certainly, the average labor costs, from the returns received by the commission, are practically identical for Canada and the United States.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

The following table shows shingle imports and exports by quantity and value:

From the above table it is seen that the United States both imports and exports shingles, though the imports greatly exceed the exports. The imports constituted in 1919 nearly 25 per cent of the domestic consumption, while the exports were only about 0.2 per cent. The exports, though small, however, are widely distributed, while the imports come almost exclusively from Canada.

TARIFF HISTORY.

Shingles were admitted free in the act of 1894. In 1897 they were made dutiable at the rate of 30 cents per 1,000, which rate was raised to 50 cents in the act of 1909. In 1913 they were returned to the free list.

COMPETITIVE CONDITIONS.

The only country from which serious competition is to be apprehended is Canada, and the cost studies made in a previous paragraph show the cost of production as shown by averages is slightly less in Washington-Oregon ($4.77) than in British Columbia ($5.04).

As pointed out, however, averages, where the costs for individual mills differ so widely, are misleading. It gives a false impression to think of Washington-Oregon as a unit competing with British Columbia as a unit. Some producers in each region find no difficulty in meeting competition from the other region. Other producers in each region do find difficulty. British Columbia possesses some advantage in that the red cedar is found growing in pure stands, while across the border it is found chiefly in mixed stands with the Douglas fir. The provincial government imposes the same conditions in regard to the exports of red cedar logs and bolts that it imposes upon other logs. The British Columbia manufacturers, therefore, are not so dependent upon the vicissitudes of the Douglas fir trade as those in the States. Moreover, oriental labor is employed to a greater extent in the Canadian mills. They work for somewhat lower wages, but it has been asserted that what is gained by the lower wage is lost in the greater wastefulness of material. Certainly, so far as the averages shown above are representative of conditions, the Canadians have no advantage in labor costs; $1.15 per 1,000 in Washington-Oregon and $1.16 per 1,000 in British Columbia.

In making use of cost studies, however, to form a judgment as to competitive conditions allowance must be made for the rate of exchange. It is difficult to estimate just how great this allowance must be, for some of the costs in Canada are paid in American money (for example, in some cases laborers leaving the United States to work in Canada have demanded and received payment in American money. Machinery and supplies imported into Canada from the United States may be paid for in American exchange), and some of the sales in America are paid in Canadian exchange. To the extent, however, that Canadian costs are in terms of Canadian money while Canadian sales are in terms of American exchange, the Canadian competitors are placed in an advantageous position. Canadian discount in 1920 averaged about 12 per cent. (From graph prepared by the Royal Bank of Canada.) On this basis average Canadian costs, reduced to terms of American money, would be $4.44 instead of $5.04, thus showing 33 cents lower than American costs. Of course, if in making shipments to the United States payments were made in terms of Canadian exchange, the advantage derived from a lower cost would be neutralized. But to the extent that payments on the same price basis were made in terms of American exchange—and it is known that in 1920 such was quite generally the case—the Canadian producers would have an advantage. However, as stated in a previous paragraph, competition between Washington-Oregon and British Columbia is more a matter of relative efficiency in individual mills than a question of international advantage between the two regions, each taken as a whole.

That some American shingle producers find no difficulty in meeting Canadian competition on equal terms is evidenced by the exports. These, though small compared with the imports, are yet substantial, averaging for the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 over 24,000,000 shingles per year. It is significant that of these exports some 14 per cent were shipped to Canada itself and the remainder to widely extended markets. At present (August, 1921) shingles are admitted free, both in the United States and Canada.

The leading men in the industry are divided on the question of the tariff. Some demand a duty as a means of meeting Canadian competition. Others, holding that the price of shingles will in any event be fixed by the competition with roofing substitutes, are of the opinion that it is more for the advantage of American manufacturers to unite with their Canadian competitors in an aggressive advertising campaign for wood shingles to meet the competition of shingle substitutes than to antagonize them by tariff legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have sent for the report of the Tariff Commission in reply to the criticism of their findings which was just read into the RECORD by the Senator from Washington. When it arrives I shall also ask that it be printed in the RECORD immediately after the statements which I have just made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM RE COMMUNICATION OF AMERICAN SHINGLE MANUFACTURERS TO UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION ON THE SUBJECT OF TARIFF INFORMATION SURVEY FL-37, SHINGLES.

Because of the serious character of the criticisms leveled against the report it is advisable to take them up in detail.

1. The year 1920 was selected as being the last year for which data were available at the time the survey was prepared. The objections to this year were forestalled in the report itself. On page 55 will be found the following words: "The above comparison by averages shows the cost to be slightly greater in British Columbia than in Washington-Oregon—$5.04 per 1,000 as compared with $4.77. Conclusions from this result should, however, be made with caution. * * * Finally, both costs and prices in 1920 were abnormal. While both British Columbia and Washington-Oregon were affected by the abnormal conditions, it is possible that one region was more affected than the other.

As to whether the survey is superficial or not is, of course, for the reader to judge. Extensive data were collected by an agent in the field, accountants were sent out to check the accuracy of the data by inspection of the books of mills both in Canada and the United States, and much painstaking and laborious effort was expended in presenting and interpreting the data. The work was certainly not hasty. The only hasty thing about the report was the insertion of the footnote on page 60, of which more will be said later.

2. The prices referred to were obtained from the following sources: A telegram from the Shingle Branch West Coast Lumbermen's Association, a telegram from the Grays Harbor Shingle Co., quotations from the Timberman, and from sample copies of the Daily Shingle Market Reports issued by the Shingle Branch West Coast Lumbermen's Association, and data taken from records of sales as shown by manufacturers. The telegram from the Shingle Branch of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association was made the basis to which the prices of grades not directly given in the telegram were reduced.

We were led to believe that quotations in the telegram were "per square," and as all other figures in the report were discussed on the basis of the "thousand" as a unit, the prices per square were adjusted to the thousand basis. If, as we assume from the criticism, our assumption was incorrect, the prices on page 54 of the survey are too high. This being the case, our error is greatly to be regretted, but as in using these prices to compute costs ratios only were used, and as the absolute costs would not affect the ratios, the final result in the cost per thousand of producing shingles would not be affected. Any other error that may appear could only result from our attempt to reduce to the same basis prices of grades not given in the telegram. It is not believed that any error which could have arisen in this process could have appreciably affected the result.

3. There are nearly three times as many shingles produced in Washington alone as in British Columbia, and therefore it is quite possible that the statement ("in reality there are more high-grade shingles produced in Oregon and Washington than in Canada") is correct. However, judging by the schedules submitted to the commission by the individual mills on both sides of the line, the relative proportions are such as to warrant the statement on page 54 of the survey, "The grade of shingle produced in British Columbia averages distinctly higher than that produced in Washington-Oregon."

4. From an actual study of the cost account methods employed by the shingle producers of the Northwest, it was evident that no uniform system of segregating shingle costs by grades was in use; in fact, of the mills visited, there were only three that attempted such cost segregation on their books. It is difficult to see how, as the business was generally conducted, it would be possible to make such a segregation with accuracy. Several grades were made in the same mill at a joint cost. The same machines were used for sawing the several grades, some parts of the same log were sawn into our grade and other parts with another. In the face of these conditions it seemed necessary to make some hypothesis. Confessedly, the hypothesis adopted was imperfect, but it seemed to be the best available, and, at least roughly, serve the purpose of reducing costs in Canada and the United States to a common unit. Had it not been made the average Canadian cost would have shown much higher, and the average United States cost much lower than they were made to appear in the survey. In other words, the manner of presenting costs actually worked to the advantage of the interests in the United States asking protection. The commission would certainly welcome data which would enable it more convincingly or accurately to present the facts.

5. We can only state that the price quoted was derived from data submitted by some of the sources mentioned in No. 2 above. We regret the error, if error there was.

6. Referring to our quotation of "stars," which you say are not manufactured, we can only reply that the grade of "stars" is a term which our experts have constantly heard used by shingle manufacturers in the Northwest, and 11 of the mills furnishing cost data mentioned stars among the grades produced, as is shown by their own costs' statements. In fact, your Mr. Case shows costs for this particular grade.

7. Our statement, "Oriental labor is employed to a greater extent in the Canadian mills," was in the exact words of a gentleman prominent in the lumber interests in Seattle. If no oriental labor is employed in Washington-Oregon our statement is certainly within the truth.

8. The statement, "They (orientals) work for somewhat lower wages, but it has been asserted that what is gained in lower wages is lost in greater wastefulness of material," was made by an official of the Shingle Branch West Coast Lumbermen's Association, a man certainly in a position to speak with authority on the subject.

We have before us the pay roll, September 1 to 15, 1920, of a shingle mill located in New Westminster, British Columbia. Judging by the names, 43 per cent of the sawyers are not orientals. The packers appear to be, with one exception, all orientals. The pay roll of another Canadian shingle mill, August 16 to 21, 1920, shows 57 per cent white. It is clear that the advantage of oriental labor at that time was not so pronounced as to exclude white labor. We are unable to give a categorical answer to your question, "If oriental labor is so wasteful, why is it the dominating labor in British Columbia shingle mills, when so much white labor is available?" but we would suggest that there may be other reasons—assuming the fact to be as stated—other than less labor cost; trade-union difficulties, for example.

9. The statement, "so far as averages shown above are representative, the Canadians have no advantage in labor costs," is strictly in conformity with facts. The schedules submitted showed labor cost to average $1.15 per 1,000 for the United States and $1.16 per 1,000 for British Columbia. From the pay rolls above referred to we extract the following statements: From an American mill—"Paid 32 cents for sawing 'Perfections,' 28 cents for sawing all others." From a Canadian mill—"white sawyers, 33 cents per 1,000; chink, 29 cents per 1,000; Perfections, 31 cents per 1,000." The difference is certainly inconsiderable.

10-11. The possible error in prices was explained in (2).

12. The statement in regard to the opinions of leading men was made by the same official of the Shingle Branch West Coast Lumbermen's Association, who made the statement in regard to relative cost of oriental and American labor. His statement in full was as follows: "As to protection there is a difference of opinion among members. Formerly protection was justifiable. Now costs are about the same. The matter of the tariff has been discussed by the trustees. The prevailing opinion was that it was better to keep both Canadians and Americans in the association and have the benefit of larger funds for marketing and salesmanship methods to meet the competition of roofing substitutes. The price will be fixed by these substitutes in any event. But the shingle branch is not officially on record for or against a tariff."

At this point a word should be said about the suppressed footnote on page 60. At the time when the page proof had been returned for final revision the December 17 issue of the American Lumberman had just been received. On the strength of a statement on page 48 of that issue the footnote was prepared and inserted. This was done because it was feared that the statement in the text obtained in 1920 did not represent the present position of the industry. Shortly after the survey came out a telegram was received from one of the associations mentioned in the footnote emphatically denying its truth so far as that association was concerned. A more careful reading of the article in the American Lumberman showed that it was capable of a different interpretation than that given to it in the footnote. In any event the matter was clearly controversial and it seemed best to suppress the footnote.

In regard to your closing protest we may say that it is the customary policy of the commission to welcome criticism and suggestion upon its surveys and reports, before they appear, by persons competent to pass judgment. In conformity with this policy the survey in question was submitted to Dr. Wilson Compton, secretary of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association; Donald D. Conn, representing Shevlin, Carpenter & Clark; and to E. E. Case, George A. Bergstrom, and W. C. McMaster, representing the shingle interests. Suggestions made by all of these gentlemen were incorporated in the survey. It is much to be regretted that the error in prices, referred to above, escaped the notice of all of these gentlemen as well as the authors of the survey.

Surely the names of the above-mentioned gentlemen are sufficient evidence of the absence of intent to show any such partiality as is implied in your protest.

Inasmuch as matter already printed in the report is now controversial and its conclusions were based upon the experience of an abnormal year, we would welcome your cooperation in preparing a supplement based on the experience of 1921, for which data are now doubtless available.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we should have a quorum to hear this discussion, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pittman	Willis
Hale	McCormick	Poindexter
Harreld	McCumber	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I contend that there is no ground whatever for a tariff duty on shingles or lumber. The cost of manufacturing shingles in Canada is equal to or greater than that in the United States. In all competing territory east of the Montana-Dakota line the freight rates are the same. In the Pacific Coast States the freight rates are against Canada and in favor of the Washington and Oregon distributers. The exchange rates are the same; the prices of labor are substantially the same. There is a tremendous shortage of shingles and building lumber throughout the United States, the prices are rising, and the operators themselves are advertising to-day to keep the prices down, yet some of the shingle mills are coming here and demanding protection, in order that they may faster and faster destroy American forests.

There never was a case presented where there was less ground, on the facts, for a protective-tariff duty, and it is protection going mad to put a tariff duty on building materials, when to-day there is a shortage of houses in this country of more than 1,300,000. The shingle mills of Oregon are running to capacity, and many of them running double shifts, making more money than they have made any year, perhaps, except 1920.

There are many principles governing this question. In the first place, they do not need it; in the second place, we ought not to place a duty on lumber, logs, or shingles, or any of the raw material which will induce the more rapid destruction of American forests. That is a principle which ought to govern in the matter of fixing a tariff duty on shingles.

It is estimated by the Forest Service that we have not in existence in this country over 40 or 50 years' supply of timber. The prime forests of Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin are practically exhausted now. They make shingles in Maine, and have a better market than they ever have had before. Yet we are asked to place a duty on shingles, to burden the farmer and the builder who wants a home to-day, in order that we may faster destroy the forests of the United States. I am a reasonable protectionist, but I can not go that far.

Mr. President, 45 per cent of the lumber used in this country is used on the farm, and to-day the reports show a great shortage of lumber for farm building in this country. Furthermore, I will show by the advertisements of the lumbermen in Washington and Oregon that there is a shortage in this country estimated at from five to over twenty billion feet of lumber, and that they are advertising to buy with care, that the prices may not be put too high.

Everyone knows of the shortage of housing in this country. The best authorities estimate that there is a shortage of houses of 1,389,000. That is based upon the experience of a long term of years, and a calculation of the number of houses to be built as our population increases. We all know that during the war the inability to obtain labor and lumber, and the demand for lumber for other purposes, made it difficult, if not impossible, to build houses to keep up with the demands of the people. The building permits for the month of March this year exceed those issued during any other month for many years. There were 121,550 building permits issued for the month of March, 1922, and yet we are asked to put a duty on shingles because the shingle production has decreased below what it was a few years ago. Shingle production, perhaps, has decreased because of the competition of other kinds of roofing material in the large cities required by the building ordinances, but in the country, on the farms, the demand for shingles is as great as ever, and everyone will admit that to-day there is a shortage, and that there is a tremendous demand in this country.

The Chief Forester, in reply to a resolution of the Senate, in his report of June 1, 1920, said:

> Eighty per cent of the county agents report that the extremely high prices of lumber are placing a handicap on farm development and the production of crops and live stock. The most serious effect reported appears to prevail throughout the sparsely timbered regions, where in cases of emergency the farmer is not able to secure supplies from the farm woodland. Live-stock raising and dairying seem to be the hardest hit, because of the large barn equipment and shelter necessary. It is reported that heavy losses of implements and crops are resulting from lack of proper storage facilities. In some of the newer sections it is even reported that farmers who have not yet reached a stable financial basis are leaving the land because of the cost of new construction. It is reported from all parts of the territory covered that present conditions are tending to lower the standards of living and to make it more difficult to hold on the farm the farmer's own children and desirable classes of labor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. For my own information, did the Senator state that the shingle mills in Washington and Oregon are operating full time?

Mr. KELLOGG. I did, and I will prove it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is, running to full capacity?

Mr. KELLOGG. All the way from 90 to 110 per cent, varying, of course, in the mills.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator answer two more questions, either now or when he comes to them? First, what is the difference in the cost of production here and in Canada; and, second, what are the importations?

Mr. KELLOGG. The importations are something under 2,000,000,000 shingles out of 9,000,000,000 used in the United States. The cost of production in Canada is stated very carefully by the Tariff Commission after an exhaustive investigation, and I shall give the figures as I proceed. They state that the cost of production is greater in Canada than in the United States. I understand after this elaborate reply to the Tariff Commission report was made by the shingle manufacturers of Washington and Oregon the commission, after reinvestigating the matter, refused to take back their report and stand by their original figures.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Minnesota understand how it is that the Tariff Commission can assert, as he claims they do, that the cost of producing shingles is greater in Canada than it is in the United States in the face of the fact that we have levied a tariff upon hundreds, if not thousands, of articles in the pending tariff bill to protect the American manufacturers against Canadian products in all lines of industry? Why is it there is an exception in the case of shingles?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will state the facts as they appear in the Tariff Commission's report: That the cost is not greater in the United States; that there is no need of protection; that the markets are open to both; that in fact, so far as freight rates are concerned in the territory of the Pacific coast, the American producer has the advantage.

Mr. President, the duty on lumber has received wide consideration. I have not the time to state all of the protests which have been received against the duty on lumber. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] stated he never knew there was any opposition to the tariff. The American Farm Bureau presented resolutions, and I have copies of them, and letters and protests from more than 260 farm bureau organizations in the United States against it. The legislatures of a number of States have passed resolutions against it. Colorado was one, Minnesota was another, and California was another. I do not remember them all. Building associations, farm bureaus, retail lumber associations, boards of trade, and various industrial organizations from 27 States have petitioned against the duty on shingles or lumber, and yet the Senator from Washington said he did not know there was any objection. Let me read some of these protests. Here is one sent to Mr. FORDNEY on May 20, 1921, signed by the American Farm Bureau, and a comment on it by Mr. Silver, of the farm bureau, in a letter to me of May 8:

> I herewith inclose you copies of our letters of May 20 and June 20, 1921, to Mr. FORDNEY, together with resolution passed by the executive committee of the American Farm Bureau Federation, also copy of resolutions passed by the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation and the Minnesota State Legislature, all in opposition to a duty on lumber, and a list of the States whose farm bureaus have passed resolutions similar to that of Minnesota. We are also sending you a resolution passed by 296 county farm bureaus voicing their opposition to a duty on lumber, and who are vitally interested in this matter, as farmers are the largest consumers of lumber.

Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted at the end of my remarks the resolutions and letters which were sent to Mr. FORDNEY over a year ago, as well as those sent me, to which I have just referred.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Do they make any distinction between a tariff on lumber and a tariff on shingles?

Mr. KELLOGG. In the same letter to which I have just referred, and which will be placed in the RECORD, it is stated that they do not make any distinction. I ask that the whole of the letter be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Appendix A.)

Mr. KELLOGG. It is stated here that the shingle mills of Oregon and Washington are idle and that they are losing money, while the shingle mills across the line are running full blast, and making money. Does that not strike one as a little peculiar, in view of the fact that the freight rates are the same, the prices of labor substantially the same, the same general country within reach of the same market?

But let me show what some of their own men say about the subject. I have here a telegram signed by A. W. Cooper, secretary of the Western Pine Manufacturing Association of Portland, Oreg., dated May 2, 1922. He said:

> At present 80 to 95 per cent shingle mill capacity operating. Have figures by districts of average between 85 to 90 per cent operating as near as obtainable. These are same as March, 1920. Practically all mills now operating that can operate.
> A. W. COOPER.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What was the date of the telegram?

Mr. KELLOGG. May 2, 1922.

When the gentlemen from Oregon were down here urging the Senate Committee on Finance to place a duty on shingles certain statements were made. I would like to read some of the statements which were then being made through the lumber publishers' organization in the United States. I have here the West Coast Lumberman, published on October 1, 1921, at the very time this matter was pending before the committee. Here is a paragraph from one of the articles:

> One of the Northwest leading producers of red-cedar shingles has notified its many customers that it will guarantee them against any further advance in prices until January 1. This move was made in the hope that it might be able to prevent another spectacular jump in the price of shingles, jumps which have been occurring now and then for years, and which have been harmful to the industry.

Does that look as though they needed very much protection? Again:

Some figures have recently been compiled showing that the country's annual freight bill on lumber is now about $200,000,000 annually. When one considers that at the present time the bulk of the lumber used in the United States moves on a comparatively small freight rate one wonders what toll lumber will be some 10 or 15 years from now.

And yet it is proposed to add a tariff on top of that—at least, some want it.

Here is another article:

Shingles have continued to advance to the point where leading manufacturers hope that there will be no further increase in prices. In fact, one of the largest producers of the Northwest is out with a guaranteed price good until January 1. This manufacturer believes that further advances will be harmful; and if he can induce several other producers to guarantee their prices the general demand for red-cedar shingles will not be checked, as they fear it will be if prices keep on skyrocketing. There has been a legitimate cause for the advance in shingle prices. The contributing causes are limited production all summer; the fact that stocks at storage points and in transit a month or six weeks ago were the lowest that they had been for months; cedar logs are becoming increasingly scarce, due not only to the steady exhaustion of the supply of raw material but more especially at this time to the fact that Japan is purchasing millions of feet of red-cedar logs.

Washington, Oregon, and Canada are exporting red-cedar logs to Japan, which country has prohibited the destruction of her forests.

This was on October 1, 1921. I have obtained the prices on October 1, 1921, and on June 3, 1922, and except as to two of the lower grades of shingles the prices are higher to-day than they were on October 1, 1921. On perfections on October 1, 1921, the price was $3.40, and on June 3, 1922, the price was $3.61. On Eurekas the price on October 1, 1921, was $2.81, and on June 3, 1922, the price was $2.91. On perfects the price on October 1, 1921, was $2.97, and on June 3, 1922, the price was $3.30.

Now, Mr. President, let me read some more of the articles which have been appearing in the Northwest coast lumber journals and statements by some of the manufacturers. I have here an article which was sent from Seattle, dated May 6, 1922, on the lumber industry, headed:

Million homes to rise in 18 months, lumbermen say—Plants use day and night shifts to meet increased demand—Shingle mills alone employ 7,000 in far Northwest—Foreign needs expand.

This is a better argument than I can make, and I would like to read it into the RECORD:

SEATTLE, May 6.—Affording double employment for mill crews and inaugurating a prosperous season for the Northwest lumber industry, plants are using day and night shifts to expand their production to meet increased lumber demand and to clean up accumulated back orders from all sections of the United States.

Northwest lumbermen also announce that both foreign and Atlantic seaboard buyers have increased their orders, strengthening the lumber market. Additional proof that the Nation is proceeding with its greater building program is being furnished by wholesalers in increased inquiries and orders.

A great housing shortage exists. During the war and the period immediately following all classes of people put off building; some for patriotic reasons, others believing lumber prices would tumble.

MILLION NEW HOMES FORECAST.

Northwest lumbermen estimate that in the next 18 months more than a million new homes will be erected in the United States. From one corner to another of the Nation larger demand annually is being made on the Northwest for wooden building materials. This is particularly true of red-cedar shingles. Long trains of shingles are creeping into the yards of big American cities, bearing the housetops from the tree tops of the Pacific coast's big stand of timber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is there anything stated in the article which shows whether these long trainloads of shingles come from the United States or from British Columbia? The forests are continuous; they are not stopped by the international boundary. One of the very striking and dramatic showings which have been made in regard to this matter is the taking of empty cars through the State of Washington into British Columbia and loading them with shingles and bringing them back through the State of Washington to market. That may not be the case with the shipments to which the Senator from Minnesota has referred, but it may be, so far as I know.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall show before I am through by the statements of lumbermen from the Northwest themselves that there is a shortage of shingles and a tremendous demand; that prices are going up. It is not reasonable to suppose that long trainloads of shingles are running from Canada to the United States and that at the same time the shingle mills of Washington and Oregon are idle; and it is not true, either. On that point this article says:

There are 280 shingle mills humming in Washington, half as many in Oregon, and many in Idaho. Some of the mills are small but are increasing their equipment as fast as machinery can be installed. More than 1,000 shingle-making machines are turning out the thin cedar boards with the marvelous machine-gun speed by which in 12 months they will provide more than 7,000,000,000 pieces for the country's markets.

Does that look as though the shingle mills needed protection in the States of Oregon and Washington? A telegram which I have states that prices are still advancing and that production is increasing. This article further states:

Seven thousand men are employed in shingle mills alone. As many more are working in the forests getting out the huge logs from which the bolts are cut. Twice that many men are working in the fir, hemlock, and spruce lumber mills cutting and planing the material for the building trades. The sudden leap in demand has sent large crews of loggers into the woods. More than 50 new camps have opened temporarily in the forests adjacent to this city. Several huge tracts of fine standing timber, held intact for a decade, are being cut for the present market.

Coupled with the domestic rush to erect new homes, farm buildings, and business houses is the enormous call for forest products from the Orient. Japan is in the midst of a national building program, China is just beginning a home-building era, while the demand from Australia and the Antipodes is growing with every cable.

GREATEST YEAR FORECAST.

It authoritatively is stated by leading lumbermen here that the production of lumber, shingles, and other forest material during 1922 will exceed any other previous year, including 1918, when war orders kept the mills in perpetual motion.

There is no car shortage in the Northwest, so that lumber is moving as fast as cars can be loaded and switched. Lumberyards throughout the Middle West and Central States are anxious to fill their sheds with lumber for the summer farmer trade. Flat cars, box cars, cattle cars, and coal-dumping cars are utilized for the lumber-carrying business, depending upon the distance of the haul and the character of the timber.

A recent survey of the available forests yet standing in the Northwest would indicate that at the present annual cut there is yet more than a century's supply. In many cutover tracts the second-growth timber will be of commercial size in two years.

I have read the entire article.

Mr. President, does that indicate that the shingle mills of Washington are idle and need protection in order to sell shingles in the United States, particularly in view of the tremendous shortage of buildings which exists? I have here a copy of a magazine which is entitled "Mississippi Valley Lumbermen" which was published at Minneapolis, Minn., May 19, 1922, containing some interviews by Northwest lumbermen. I will read one of those interviews, because they are very pertinent to the inquiry. Here is a statement which is headed "Views of prominent manufacturers and wholesalers," which reads:

PRESENT LUMBER SITUATION AND PROSPECTS FOR THE FUTURE OF TRADE AS SEEN BY LUMBERMEN OF THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST—THE NATIONAL LUMBER & MANUFACTURING CO., HOQUIAM, WASH.

KEEP COOL.

There is a shortage of lumber in the United States of about 5,000,000,000 feet board measure. This is based on every manufacturer, dealer, and consumer carrying old-time normal stock. This is not necessary.

Mills in the West, at least, are running above normal and are turning out a lot of lumber. Any reasonable demand can be cared for. We recommend close and careful buying of just what you need, as you need it. On spurts, lumber will be found scarce, and if you become excited and, wanting one carload, order a car from a dozen different men, figuring on canceling the other 11 when you receive notice that your car has been shipped, you will spill the beans for yourself and others.

Manufacturers are part human and react to the same impulse as other mortals, and if there is a scramble for lumber prices will be advanced beyond reason. You must remember that they are pretty lean, as last year used up a lot of fat accumulated during years of ease. The custom was to book business in the early part of the year to be shipped during the year largely at mill convenience, price being based on this privilege. This practice has been discontinued by most of the better mills, who are only booking business that can be shipped quickly.

Under the existing conditions business offered to-day might not be desirable, but perhaps would be very desirable a week hence as order books are cleaned up.

You must take this into account and work with the men you have confidence in. We, of course, would like to be considered one of such, and would like to work with you for a steady market. It will be no easy task, as a short supply of lumber and a threatened car scarcity generally spell "scares, booms, and disappointments." So keep cool, buy mixed cars, and don't crowd, and if everybody will work on this plan we will all do more business and feel better toward one another than we will if there is a rush and a hurrah. "To ellmitem" is a poor slogan for anybody, but particularly so for the lumber fraternity.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks, without reading, similar articles from the J. E. Morris Lumber Co. (Inc.), of Seattle, Wash.; from the John D. Collins Lumber Co., of Seattle, Wash.; and from the Henry D. Davis Lumber Co., of Portland, Oreg. They are all to the same general effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a publication which is called the National Lumber Trade Barometer, which is published once a month. It gives the normal in orders, in production, and in shipments. This information is gathered from the various lumber-producing concerns in the United States. On June 2, 1922, the orders were 118 per cent of normal, the production was just normal, and the shipments were about 110 per cent of normal, showing orders and shipments to be greater than normal and production at the time to be normal.

I have a similar statement, dated May 5, 1922, which shows substantially the same condition. I will not stop to read it.

Mr. President, it was stated by the Senator from Washington that it costs much more to produce shingles in the State of Washington than it does in British Columbia and that labor worked from 9 to 10 hours in British Columbia and only 8 hours in the State of Washington. To-day, Mr. President, in the State of Washington there are mills—I do not say the practice is universal—where men are working 10 hours and there are mills where there are double shifts. There are oriental laborers employed in Washington and Oregon mills and there are oriental laborers employed in Canadian mills. I can not give the exact statistics, but I was informed that out of the 18,000 men employed in the industry in Canada only 4,680 were orientals, and that there were over 6,000 orientals working in Washington and Oregon in the lumber industry. However, whether that is true or whether it is not true, the Tariff Commission took the whole subject into consideration.

Before coming to that, however, let me suggest some other things as to which the Washington and Oregon lumbermen have at least an equal advantage, and, I think, a greater advantage. East of the Montana-Dakota line the freight rates to the eastern market are the same from British Columbia and from Washington and Oregon. Running south into the southern part of Oregon, into Nevada, and into portions of the Pacific coast, there are no rates by rail that enable the British Columbia manufacturers to reach that territory, and the only way they can reach large portions of that territory is to ship by water down to San Francisco, which method the Washington and Oregon lumbermen can use as well as the British Columbia lumbermen; in other words, the Washington and Oregon manufacturers have an advantage in the States lying west of Utah to the Mexican line and from there to the British Columbia line. Rates of exchange to-day are equal, so that there is no advantage in favor of the Canadian lumbermen in that respect.

Mr. President, as I have said, the Tariff Commission made a very careful study. I have not time to read their report into the record, but the commission sent experts into Washington and Oregon. They examined the reports and books of many Washington and Oregon mills as well as British Columbia mills, and they state in Tariff Information Survey F–L 37, at pages 54, 55, 56, 57, and subsequent pages, their reasons for reporting that the cost of production is greater in Canada than in the United States. They take certain grades of shingles which are comparable, and the result is stated on page 55 of the survey, as follows:

As determined by the above process the total cost per 1,000 was found to be for American mills $4.77 and for British Columbia $5.04.

The labor cost for the two regions was practically the same—$1.15 per 1,000 for the United States and $1.16 per 1,000 for British Columbia, and the log cost $2.90 for the United States and $2.98 for British Columbia.

An application of the above principle was made to determine the cost of manufacturing the several grades. The result is shown in Table XXV.

Then a table is given, which I shall not stop to read, following which the commission says:

Comparing these costs with those shown for 1920—labor $1.15, logs $2.90, other $0.72; total $4.77—it is seen that the total cost was nearly three times as great in 1920 as in 1914. During the present year (1921) there has been a sharp decline in both costs and prices.

Showing that the Tariff Commission made a very careful study of this subject, and that both in 1920, for which year the figures were given, and in 1921, when the report was published, production costs were substantially greater in British Columbia than in the United States.

Mr. President, a significant fact is that that is not confined to shingles either. It applies to all lumber, for on pages 22, 23, and 24 will be found the comparative costs of ordinary lumber as between British Columbia and Washington and Oregon, the west coast, the cost being in British Columbia $36.89 and in Washington and Oregon $33.53. This survey not only demonstrates the cost in British Columbia to be greater as to shingles, but the same evidence applies to other lumber, and no one questions that report as to other lumber.

I am informed—I have not got the report yet, but I understand—that this criticism of the report of the commission was made to the Tariff Commission in order to induce them to change their report, and that they examined the subject over again and refused to do it. I will get the report, if it is extant, and place it in the RECORD.

Mr. President, there has not been a year except 1920 when the lumbermen were making more money than they are making to-day. That is shown by the report of the Tariff Commission. The commission says:

There was considerable difference of opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of imposing a duty on lumber, but no single operator was found who was willing to assert that American operators could not compete with Canadian operators on equal terms. Some asserted that labor costs were somewhat higher in Canada, others that they were not—

And so forth.

Again, they give the tables of the profits per 1,000 feet of lumber received on an average throughout the United States from 1905 to 1920, including nine months of 1920. I ask that this table at the top of page 23 be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks, without reading.

(See Appendix C.)

Mr. KELLOGG. This table shows that in 1905 the average profit was $1.99 per 1,000; in 1920 it was $10.72; and I am informed that in 1922 it reached about the highest period, except the year 1920, or somewhere about $4.50 or $5 per 1,000.

Mr. President, in the face of this record, with a shortage in building material in the United States, with prices going up, with dealers in Washington and Oregon advertising to keep the prices down, with a demand greater than they can fill, with our forests being swept away, contrary to the public policy of the Nation, are we going to place a duty on lumber or shingles or logs in this year 1922? Why, Mr. President, it ought to be a national policy to encourage the preservation of our forests and to invite all possible importation of timber. A tariff would mean destruction rather than protection of American industries. Let them ship in their raw materials; let them ship in their logs and their lumber to the manufacturers of this country. Let us listen to the voice of the millions of people to-day who are trying to build homes and not place a tariff on lumber, such a necessity in the construction of homes and in building generally in this country.

APPENDIX A.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KELLOGG: I herewith inclose you copies of our letters of May 20 and June 20, 1921, to Mr. FORDNEY, together with resolution passed by the executive committee of the American Farm Bureau Federation, also copy of resolutions passed by the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation and the Minnesota State Legislature, all in opposition to a duty on lumber, and a list of the States whose farm bureaus have passed resolutions similar to that of Minnesota. We are also sending you a resolution passed by 296 county farm bureaus voicing their opposition to a duty on lumber, and who are vitally interested in this matter, as farmers are the largest consumers of lumber.

Of course, shingles should be classified as lumber, for they are sawed at the mill from the original logs, and should not be classed as manufactured lumber in the usual sense. You understand, of course, that the lumber here referred to includes shingles, and rightly so, for roofing is one of the expensive items on the farm. In fact, so much so that in response to a general demand for a cheaper material I have taken up with the producers of copper, zinc, and other metals the question of some way of finding a better and more durable roofing within reach of the country buyer.

Sincerely yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION.
GRAY SILVER, Washington Representative.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., May 20, 1921.

Hon. J. W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: As you probably know, the American Farm Bureau Federation held a conference of its executive committee and representatives of State federations in Washington during the two weeks following April 11. On April 22 this conference, officially representing the entire American Farm Bureau Federation, passed a resolution, copy of which is attached, protesting against the placing of any import duty upon lumber either in the rough or dressed state.

The total normal annual cut in this country is equivalent to about 24,000,000,000 cubic feet of standing timber (51,000,000,000 feet board measure and 110,000,000 cords of firewood). Of this amount the farmers consume close to 11,000,000,000 cubic feet, or 46 per cent of the entire cut. Agriculture, therefore, may be justly considered the greatest single wood-using industry of the United States.

Of the total saw timber material, agriculture consumes 10,600,000,000 feet board measure, out of which 6,750,000,000 feet board measure is used for construction purposes. Nine hundred million feet board measure is made up of slack cooperage, shingles, and poles, and the balance is lumber in manufactured products purchased by the farmers. In addition to this consumption, the farmers consume 8,600,000,000 cubic feet of timber products in the form of fencing and fuel wood. The 10,600,000,000 feet board measure are equivalent to 2,400,000,000 cubic feet, making a total annual consumption of 11,000,000,000 cubic feet of lumber consumed by American agriculture.

The demand by the farming industry for lumber and timber products is steadily increasing and any curtailment in the supply of such materials will result in very serious injury to agricultural interests of the country. When we realize that the annual growth and reproduction in this country is in the neighborhood of 6,000,000,000 feet and is mostly in the lower grades, we realize how seriously threatened is our future timber supply. With a situation such as this facing the country it would seem to us entirely impracticable to consider the placing of a duty on the importation of lumber. In fact, the conditions existing would point rather to the necessity of adopting a policy which would remove as far as possible the burden of supplying our needs from our rapidly depleting supply. Every piece of lumber imported from Canada saves just that much from our remaining supply and, therefore, from a conservation angle a tariff on lumber merely serves to more rapidly deplete our own forest reserve.

We have carefully examined the testimony before your committee and note several statements that are practically admissions on the part of the lumber interests that on a basis of cost they have nothing to fear from the importation of Canadian lumber. On the other hand, the fact that Canada imposes a 25 per cent ad valorem duty and has in addition to that an antidumping provision which allows them to further assess a 15 per cent ad valorem duty to protect Canadian lumber from American imports would strengthen our belief that our lumber does not need protection from Canadian lumber. This would leave the tariff on lumber as purely a revenue measure. It is estimated that we might possibly secure $1,500,000 returns from the proposed tariff. The absurdity of appropriating $7,000,000 for reforestation purposes and attempting to secure revenue from a tariff on importation of lumber would seem apparent on the face of it to anyone.

When, in addition to the general situation, we consider the present acute shortage of homes and the high prices still prevailing in construction work in this country, we can see no possible justification for a tariff on lumber at this time.

Therefore, we desire as strongly as possible to present the desires of the American Farm Bureau Federation as expressed in the attached resolution. We wish further to say that this matter has been submitted to our State and county bureaus, and we have official resolutions passed by 15 State farm bureau federations and by hundreds of county farm bureaus protesting against this tariff on lumber.

Very truly yours,

GRAY SILVER,
Washington Representative.

JUNE 20, 1921.

Hon J. W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: We have carefully considered your letter to us of May 24 in which you explained that the matter of placing a duty on lumber was for protection and not for revenue, and also your statement that the lumber industry needing protection is in the northwest section of the country. This coincides exactly with our studies of the question, namely, that the southern lumber-producing group will not be benefited by a tariff on lumber because of the freight haul.

This leaves the situation as we have seen it with the proposed tariff raising the price of all lumber in the country and further depleting our own lumber supplies in order that the lumber group in the northwest section may get a higher price for their lumber.

In this connection, when we consider the report of the Federal Trade Commission of June 9 with reference to the activities of the lumber-producing group of the Northwest, we must again make a most strenuous protest against any protection of any kind being afforded to such an industry under the present situation. Doubtless you have read the Federal Trade Commission's report of the 9th. We wish to call your particular attention to page 14, on which is pointed out by the commission the fact that the British Columbia loggers' organization had affiliated with the American loggers and representatives of the British district had participated in a meeting of the Pacific Northwest Loggers' Bureau, and since that time prices have been stabilized in both countries at the same figure.

We also wish to call your attention to other points in the report showing the tremendous increase in wholesale quotations on fir lumber and also the charge of collusion as to fixing prices and the existence of artificial methods of controlling both price and production of Douglas fir.

We are in entire sympathy with the protection of American industries that are seriously handicapped by competition with foreign countries where lower labor costs and lower standards of living allow of a much cheaper cost of production than is possible in our country, but with the effort to place in this class the Northwest Lumber Producers' Association with their complete organization and the activities they have engaged in to increase their profits at the expense of the American public we have no sympathy whatever. We wish to insist upon the statement contained in our letter of May 20 that, with the present situation of home building, and especially in view of the threatened depletion of our own forest supply, there can be no justice whatever in imposing a tariff on Canadian lumber, either in the rough or finished form, because you must realize, knowing the lumber industry as you do, that the freight rate alone is a bar to the importation of rough lumber, and that it is practically all imported dressed and would be under tariff. We think our letter of May 20 is a complete justification of our position as being a most seriously interested party in your decision.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
GRAY SILVER,
Washington Representative.

Resolution unanimously adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation in conference April 22, 1921, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the serious depletion of the Nation's timber resources constitutes a serious menace to our prosperity; and

Whereas a maintained high price of lumber will stimulate the cutting of native timber and seriously interfere with the needed building program of the country; Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Farm Bureau Federation, That, believing it to be contrary to the public interest, we are opposed to the placing of a tariff on lumber either in the rough or dressed; and be it further

Resolved, That a definite constructive policy toward forest preservation and for reforestation should be inaugurated.

Resolution offered by the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation.

Whereas it appears that the Ways and Means Committee of the National House of Representatives held hearings on January 15 and 17, 1921, relative to establishing a tariff on lumber imported from Canada; and

Whereas it is the belief of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation that imposing a tariff on lumber imported from Canada is contrary to the best interests of the American farmers and home makers; and

Whereas with prices of building material almost prohibitive to small home builders and a further added cost due to the imposition of the tariff schedule would work a great burden on farmers and home builders of America: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, That the Members in Congress representing Minnesota do all in their power to prevent the imposing of a duty or tariff on lumber and lumber products shipped into the United States.

L. E. POTTER, President.
F. L. FRENCH, Secretary.

Resolution opposing tariff on lumber adopted February 1, 1921, by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota.

To our Representatives in Congress and Washington Officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation:

Mr. Neumann introduced the following concurrent resolution:

"Whereas the present housing shortage is a matter of deep national concern, the stimulation of home construction being a vital need of the Nation, and anything that would add to the already high cost of building should fail of legislative sanction; and

"Whereas the cost of lumber production in the United States is lower than in any other country in the world, the American mill therefore needing no tariff to protect it; and

"Whereas a duty placed on lumber imported from Canada would operate to increase the cost to the ultimate consumer and thereby permit the increased financial burden to thousands of farmers and home builders of this country for the benefit of a selected few; and

"Whereas such a tariff is economically unsound, is against the best interests and general welfare of the public, would compel excessive depletion of our own timber resources, and would invite retaliatory measures on the part of Canada, to the extreme detriment of all lines of manufacture: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the Senate concurring), That the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States be, and they hereby are, urged to refrain from placing a duty on lumber imported from the Dominion of Canada; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk be, and he hereby is, instructed to mail a copy of these resolutions to each Member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives from Minnesota."

Which resolution was adopted.

APPENDIX B.

J. E. MORRIS LUMBER CO. (INC.), SEATTLE, WASH.

Since January 1, 1922, the total orders received in the various lumber-producing sections of the United States have exceeded production more than 10 per cent, and during the past week the proportion of orders has been much larger, e. g., southern pine, 44 per cent; west coast, 17 per cent; island empire, 66 per cent.

During the past few years the different lumber associations have directed their efforts toward a prompt dissemination of information to their members of the conditions, not only in their immediate district but throughout the different sections. This has tended to give us violent actions and reactions in price, especially since 1919—history-making year in price advances. And to these conditions can be attributed the extremely strong market that is being experienced at present. The actual volume of business offered on the Pacific coast can hardly justify the recent advances of several dollars per thousand. But whatever the cause, the facts are indisputable—prices have increased and orders are being placed at these advanced figures. In our letter No. 66 it was suggested that we had experienced the lowest prices for 1922, and we still adhere firmly to this view. At present the orders are largely for export and California, although there has been a real improvement in business from the granger States.

Stocks are very light, and it is noticeable that drop siding, usually one of the most plentiful of yard stock items, is to-day the most difficult to furnish and strongest in price. Dimension accumulations have been largely exhausted, especially 2 by 4 stocks, and in this size 16 and 18 foot lengths are almost unobtainable and bringing a strong price premium. Orders for common cutting have not been great in volume, but prices are following the upward trend in dimension and other items.

We believe the following represents to-day's market prices:

Spruce.

1-inch dry shop	mill base	$33.00
1¼-inch dry shop	do	39.00
1½-inch dry shop	do	41.00
2-inch dry shop	do	43.00
Spruce finish, 4 to 12 inch widths, special	over rail "B"	25.00
Spruce finish, 4 inches and wider, random	mill base	57.00
B. and Btr. Ro. green spruce	do	49.00
2-inch and 3-inch Ro. common spruce	do	20.00
1-inch, No. 1 and No. 2, dry-spruce box	do	15.00
1¼-inch and 1½-inch dry-spruce box	do	17.00
Spruce lath	do	6.00
8 and 10 inch spruce bungalow siding	do	60.00
12-inch spruce bungalow siding	do	62.00
6-inch clear and A spruce bevel siding	do	36.00
4-inch clear and A spruce bevel siding	do	35.00

Other grades spruce siding at proportionate prices.

JOHN D. COLLINS LUMBER CO., SEATTLE, WASH.

The demand continues to increase from all sections, and the stocks on hand at the mills are decreasing, especially the more popular items of yard stock, and manufacturers are becoming very indifferent about booking further orders, unless it happens to be something they are very anxious to move.

Dimensions in 16 and 18 foot lengths is very short, and long dimension is a cutting proposition and mills demand as much or more for this stock than they can get for timbers, so we have been compelled to advance our prices on this item this week. It's getting so that price does not cut much figure, as buyers are offering to place orders leaving the price entirely to the mill.

We have hopes that this condition will soon correct itself as mills begin to put on a night shift, which several of them are now doing, and which should soon enable them to get caught up, and, we hope, accumulate some stock so shipments will move forward more promptly.

With conditions as they are at present, don't be surprised to see further advances, especially on dimension and other items of common, as service and low prices do not go together at the present time.

HENRY D. DAVIS LUMBER CO., PORTLAND, OREG.

There is a strong demand for practically all items of west coast woods and prices are advancing. Shed stocks are low and badly broken on all items except No. 1 and No. 2 vertical grain fir flooring. There is a considerable supply of these items on hand. New business coming in strong from all markets. There is an especially gratifying demand from the Middle West. Dimension prices are climbing rapidly; there is very little on hand with mills.

All tidewater mills and mills within shipping reach of tidewater are sending their dimension to California and to the Atlantic coast. These markets require dimension stock to be surfaced one-fourth scant, and consequently such mills are not dressing and do not furnish any considerable portion of their stock surfaced three-eighths scant.

Good building weather conditions again prevail in California. Stocks which accumulated on the receiving docks and in the yards during the bad winter weather period are being rapidly worked off. New business is coming in from that direction in increasing volume. The California market at all times uses a large quantity of No. 3 and No. 4 uppers, and all grades in short uppers, which has absorbed everything of that kind to be had, so there is none left on hand at the mills. That market is also taking a lot of rough green clear finish and large quantities of No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 common boards and dimension.

There has been no cessation noticeable in the demand for car material. Last week the mills took on the business for another large order for box cars. At present figures are being called for from distributors on two additional inquiries for car material which requires approximately 50,000,000 feet. Mills at present have booked all of this class of material they can manufacture for the next 60 to 90 days. Present orders and prospective business in immediate sight will hold prices of car material on at least the present level for several months to come.

Spruce remains very scarce. Logging camps having spruce timber have mostly again resumed operations, but the demand for spruce of all grades has kept ahead of the supply, and evidently will continue to do so. Within the last two weeks California has cleaned up all items of spruce box on hand at the mills. The Atlantic coast is buying heavily of 2-inch, 3-inch, 4-inch No. 1 common spruce. Prices on these items show advances. Shop grades continue in big demand and are exceedingly short.

Following the demand for spruce is an active call for western hemlock. Bevel siding made of this wood is finding increasing favor with consumers. The Atlantic is buying more and more hemlock dimension, and in many instances prices paid are the same as for fir. There is, however, a large quantity of hemlock box lumber on hand with mills in shipping dry condition.

Production is increasing. All mills are running, and many of them have put on a second shift. This has only been done recently, and it is too soon to say whether the increased production will have any effect on prices. At present the demand exceeds supply and ability of mills to make shipments, and it is safe to forecast this condition will exist for at least 60 days, or until such time as mills can catch up on and complete old orders which are delinquent. This delinquency was brought about by very bad weather conditions which prevailed during the winter and early spring. Buyers can not figure on having their orders filled immediately upon receipt, as many of them seem to expect.

For the week ending May 3 sales were 38 per cent greater than production, and shipments 9 per cent below new business booked. This covers the output of 103 association mills which manufactured 87,000,000 feet.

There has been a heavy increase in the demand for western white pine yard stock, and this, together with weather conditions which have been most unfavorable for the air-drying of lumber at this season of the year, has resulted in a rapid depletion of surplus stocks in the common grades until the manufacturers find it difficult to supply the demand, and in a great many instances are compelled to turn down new business offered, or at least ask for change in specifications to make orders fit in with stocks on hand that are in shipping condition, so as to enable them to handle. Prices on all common grades are firm, and further advances may be looked for.

Factory stocks also continue in heavy demand, but are exceptionally scarce because there is no supply of air-dried shop lumber available, and mills with kiln-drying facilities are unable to meet the demand existing at the present.

No. 3 and better shop in western white pine is being quoted at $45 for No. 3 shop, $65 for the No. 2, and $75 for the No. 1 shop. These prices apply on 5/4 and 6/4 inch thickness, and are for delivery on Chicago rate of freight.

Report issued by the Western Pine Manufacturers' Association for the week ending April 29 gives volume of new orders booked during that week as 32,000,000 feet, shipments as 28,000,000 feet, and production as 23,750,000 feet. Normal production for the week is given as 31,650,000 feet. These figures result in the following percentages:

	Per cent.
Shipments above production for the week	18.75
Orders above production for the week	35.24
Orders above shipments for the week	13.89

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I listened very attentively and with great interest to the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], and it occurred to me that his speech was a typical free-trade speech, which might as well be applied to almost any other important article listed in the tariff bill as to shingles. He alleges that at this particular moment the lumber industry in general, and I think he insists that the shingle industry in particular, is in a prosperous condition, that there is a great demand for the product. He says that consequently it would be a mistake to put a duty upon the importation of shingles from a foreign country.

If that is the case, every time the steel industry gets into a prosperous condition we ought to repeal the duty on steel. It seems to me that I recollect that not so long ago Judge Gary was cautioning the steel manufacturers that the price of steel was likely to get beyond reasonable control, and that it ought to be held down; but nobody, upon the Republican side at least, suggested that on that account a policy which they claimed to advocate, of protection, should be abandoned, and that because the result which was claimed would follow from that policy had actually been accomplished steel should be put upon the free list.

It is difficult for me to understand—and the Senator from Minnesota fails to explain—why he and others should ask for protective duties against various Canadian commodities, manufactured and otherwise, because of the alleged difference in the cost of production in Canada and in the United States, but when it comes to lumber and shingles say that the same rule does not apply, but insist that while it costs more in every other instance to produce a commodity in Canada than in the United States it costs less to produce shingles. It is an utterly inconsistent proposition, entirely unexplained by the Senator from Minnesota or by anyone else.

I am informed—and the Senator can correct me if I am mistaken—that very large Minnesota lumber interests, having to a considerable extent exhausted the timber supply of Minnesota and that section of the country, have made very large investments in British Columbia timber, and it is asserted that as a natural consequence of that condition of affairs, although they have acquired the ability to make these investments through a policy of protection upon their industry while it was located in the United States, now that they desire to transfer it to a foreign country they want to get the benefit of the cheapened conditions, the greater supply of raw material, and the oriental labor in that country, and abandon the policy of protection to enjoy under a policy of free trade the benefits which come from foreign manufacture.

Mr. KELLOGG. I heard the same statements made in the Committee on Finance, and I inquired, and am informed that there is not a lumberman in my State who manufactures a single shingle in British Columbia. It would not make any difference to me if all the lumbermen of that State wanted a duty on shingles or lumber; I would not be for it. None of the large lumbermen have asked for free shingles, and I would not be for a duty if they all wanted it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have no doubt at all of the sincerity of the Senator from Minnesota, but it so happens that he is mistaken about the principal fact which he has just mentioned—that no large lumberman from Minnesota has asked for free shingles. In the hearings to which he has called attention the principal opponent of the duty of 50 cents a thousand on shingles was Mr. Conn, whose testimony in the hearings is at page 4949.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Conn testified, and I will state who Mr. Conn is, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He is a Minnesota lumberman, is he not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Conn is secretary of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of the Northwest, and I believe every retail lumberman in the United States is opposed to a duty on lumber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is the statement of Donald D. Conn, of Minneapolis, Minn., representing the Western Pine Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. KELLOGG. He is the secretary of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association, and I say, further, that the retailers from 27 States have petitioned against a duty on lumber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And the importers from about 48 States have petitioned Congress against duties on practically every commodity in the tariff bill. There is quite a difference between the retailers and the importers and the manufacturers. We are urging this on behalf of the manufacturers and upon behalf of the employees of the manufacturing industry in this country.

I am not making this statement in regard to the motives which lie back of the opposition to this duty in order to cast any invidious reflection on these men. The law allows them to take their capital into a foreign country and invest it if they see fit to do so, and if they, on account of their interest, being able to enjoy the American market with the products of the cheap foreign labor which they employ, can bring influence to bear upon the American Congress, I presume they have a right to do so. Nevertheless, Congress ought to take those circumstances into consideration when arriving at its conclusion as to the proper thing to do.

As to the fact in that respect, in a telegram which I have from Robert B. Allen, of Seattle, only this morning, Mr. Allen being the secretary of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, it is said:

> The British Columbia Drafting & Blue Print Co., of 413 Granville Street, Vancouver, British Columbia, has issued a publication on British Columbia timber which shows that Minnesota people contract leases and licenses in British Columbia amounting to 458,240 acres, and that North Dakota people control 71,040 acres.

So in the statement which was quoted from quite extensively by my colleague, being an answer of some 200 leading business men interested in the shingle manufacturing business in the United States whose names are signed to it, there is an answer to the charge made by the agent of the Tariff Commission who investigated this matter, that leading men of the industry are divided on the question of a duty upon shingles to this effect:

> If you mean the leading men of the industry in the United States and Canada, that is true. If you mean a few leading men of the American industry having timber or mills in Canada, then you are correct; but if you refer to the leading American shingle manufacturers, you are mistaken.
> Below you will find the names and addresses of some 200 leading men in the American shingle industry. If you will take the trouble to write these gentlemen, you will find that there is no division on the subject of tariff other than that one of these gentlemen favors a 30-cent duty, while the rest are divided between 50 cents and 75 cents.

It is said that this duty is not needed, because the cost of production in the United States is no greater than it is in Canada. If that is the same, why put a duty of 30 cents a bushel upon wheat, why put a duty of 15 cents a bushel upon corn, why put a duty of $5 a ton upon hay, for the protection of the farmers along the international boundary line, if the labor and the other elements which enter into the cost of production in Canada are no cheaper than they are in the United States?

The trouble with a great deal of the matter which was presented by the Senator from Minnesota, much of which appeared upon a hasty consideration to be convincing, is that it relates to lumber and not to shingles. The question was asked of the Senator from Minnesota by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] whether the American Farm Bureau was referring to lumber or referring to shingles in the statement from them which the Senator from Minnesota quoted, and he said there was contained in the statement language to the effect that their objection applied equally to shingles and to lumber. I have examined the statement, which I hold in my hand, and I find no reference whatever to shingles. The objection which they are making is to a duty upon lumber, and the lumbermen of the State of Washington and of Oregon, which are the greatest lumber-producing States in the Union, are not asking for a duty upon lumber, perhaps for the very reasons suggested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The Senator said the forests are being exhausted; that we should adopt a policy of conservation. Why not close down the iron mines of Minnesota? Why exhaust, in this generation, at the rate we are exhausting them, the gas and oil which are being produced from the oil fields of the country? Why not impose an embargo upon the production of oil, and upon the production of iron in the great Mesaba Range in Minnesota, in order that those natural resources might be preserved, as the Senator says should be done in the case of the forests of the country, for some future generation?

Mr. President, my understanding of the doctrine and practice of conservation is very much to the contrary of that, and particularly in the case of a natural resource, such as a growing tree, whether it be a cedar, a fir, or any other variety, which has a capacity of reproducing itself. My idea is not that we should deny ourselves, in this generation, the benefits which come from their use and from their application to the comforts and to the industries of our people, but that we should use them in a wise way. We should so cut our timber that the forests should not be destroyed. While we are using them, they will renew themselves, so that we in our generation, as well as those who come after us, will get the benefit of them.

I fail to see very much force in the argument of the Senator from Minnesota that we ought to put lumber upon the free list in order to stop the destruction of the forests in this country, to the extent to which we will import the products of the forests of British Columbia, or other foreign countries.

To return for a moment to this question of the cost of production of shingles upon the two sides of the international boundary line, I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he has any information by which he can contradict the figures which I am about to give, which were received in reply to a special request which I made by telegram last night, in order that I might have up-to-date information from a source which I consider absolutely reliable, both on account of the means of information which my informants have and of the character of the parties from whom it came.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment; the Senator has not heard what the figures are as yet. This writer says:

> American mills are paying American sawyers 31 cents per thousand shingles in the making of perfections, while oriental sawyers in British Columbia for the same grade are getting but 21 cents.

I would like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if that is not correct? I have no information to the contrary. I believe that to be correct. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of this statement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator state those figures again? My attention was attracted elsewhere for the moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Thirty-one cents per thousand shingles is what is paid in the United States in the making of "perfections," while oriental sawyers in British Columbia for the same grade are getting but 21 cents; a difference of 10 cents a thousand.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Right in that connection, can the Senator inform me what percentage of oriental labor is used in those shingle mills?

Mr. POINDEXTER. My understanding is that it is used to a great extent, but the exact percentage I am not advised; probably near 50 per cent.

The Senator from Minnesota presented some statements on this subject coming from the same sources, I assume, from which the other figures which he stated came largely, I am inclined to believe, from those who are interested in timber in British Columbia. Those statements are that an equal percentage of orientals were employed in the shingle mills of Oregon and Washington as in the shingle mills of British Columbia. We have information which can not be doubted to the effect that that is absolutely incorrect and that no orientals employed in the American mills can be found by those who have made the investigation. There is just as much reliability, so far as accuracy of figures given on behalf of the British Columbia lumber and shingle interests is concerned as to the cost of logs out of which shingles are made, stated here by the Senator from Minnesota a moment ago to be greater in British Columbia than in Washington and Oregon, as there is in their statement as to oriental labor employed respectively in the mills of British Columbia and of Oregon and Washington. The information which I have as to the cost of logs in British Columbia and in Washington is as follows:

> We are able to keep close tab on their log and labor costs. Since my telegram of June 17 American logs have advanced and British Columbia logs declined. Cedar logs now costing American shingle mills $22.65 per thousand feet and costing British Columbia shingle mills $17.38 per thousand feet. In raw material alone this gives British Columbia mills an advantage of 75 cents per thousand shingles in the grade of perfections.

Now, either that is absolutely misleading, incorrect, and false or else the figures given by the Senator from Minnesota are entirely wrong. I can not imagine, from the knowledge which I have of the different conditions touching labor and touching the timber supply of British Columbia and of Washington, considering the much greater amount of lumbering that has been done in Washington and Oregon during the last 40 years, that it would be possible that cedar logs or shingle bolts, so-called raw materials out of which the shingles are manufactured, should cost more in British Columbia, as asserted by the Senator from Minnesota, than they cost in Oregon and Washington.

I have here a specific statement, signed by a representative of a great organization, representing an investment of $16,000,000, a reputable man, a high-class man, a good American citizen, giving the specific cost of cedar logs which go into the manufacture of shingles in British Columbia and in Washington and Oregon, and making the assertion that the advantage which the British Columbia mills have, on account of the cheaper material which they get for the manufacture of shingles, amounts to 75 cents per thousand, while we are only asking, on account of the difference both in material and in labor, a duty of 50 cents per thousand.

Mr. President, when this matter was before the Finance Committee Mr. George A. Bergstrom, representing the Pacific Lumber Co., of Everett, Wash., appeared before the committee. He is a well-known man, and there must be thousands of people in Everett, a city of some 30,000 people, where he lives, who know him and know of the shingle mills which he operates, and would know if he went before the Finance Committee of the Senate and stated a palpable falsehood as to existing conditions at the mills. This testimony was given in August, 1921:

> I do not know that I have much to say in addition to my testimony that was given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House last January. I shall be brief. In that connection, however, I will say that the predictions and prophecies that we made at that time have actually come to pass. We can not compete with British Columbia mills under severe competition. Our company operates two mills. It has an investment of about $200,000 and employs 100 men, all Americans, and practically all married, and most of them owning their own homes. On account of our inability to secure the raw material at a satisfactory price, we have been shut down since the first of this month, while our Canadian competitors have been operating continuously, and some of them even operating night and day.

Now, if that was not true, as I said, there would be thousands of people in the city where he lived who would know he was stating a falsehood to the committee. It is incredible that he should have made any such statement if it were not borne out by the facts.

I do not claim that in the shingle industry, any more than in any other industry of the country, there might not be extraordinary conditions as that it might temporarily be prosperous on account of activity in the building trade when, notwithstanding inequality and cost of production by reason of increased demand, the American industry might be able to open up its mills again and temporarily prosper. We can not fix the permanent laws and policies of the Nation, supposed to be tested and proved by the experience of generations, merely upon a temporary condition and set aside the established principle by which the general progress of the people is directed. Even though it might be true, as claimed by the Senator from Minnesota, that for the time being these mills are able to operate, I have shown by the testimony of the operator of two mills that a short time ago, at the time he was giving his testimony before the committee, under free trade in shingles the mills of British Columbia were operating night and day, while one of his mills only was able to operate in competition with them.

All of the testimony submitted by the Senator from Minnesota in regard to the lumber business fails to take into consideration the different conditions under which the two industries operate. A few laboring men may get together, if they have had a good reputation among employers, and may be able to finance themselves so that they can start a little shingle mill. There are scores of small shingle mills operating throughout the Pacific coast country, many of them by such cooperative associations as were described by my colleague, which need protection for the white American labor that they employ, for the American conditions under which those men live, against the cheaper conditions—I will not say lower conditions, but different conditions; the more economical conditions, if I may put it that way—under which the Chinamen, who are employed by the thousands in the mills of British Columbia, may labor. That is what we are asking.

The lumber industry to a very large extent is carried on and can be carried on on the Pacific coast, on account of the size of the trees, which can only be handled by expensive and heavy machinery, which can only be sawed in large mills, only by large companies heavily financed. Many of them, as they admit, have already gone across the line into the forests of British Columbia, as they have a right to do; but when they do it they ought to be willing to accept the settled policies of the United States and the conditions which apply to the manufacture of lumber in a foreign country, and they are willing to do it. The same condition, however, does not apply to the shingle industry, because the small operators can not secure holdings in the forests of British Columbia.

As was said a moment ago, cedar is largely a by-product of the lumber industry. The shingle mill cleans up after the great lumber and logging operations of the big lumbermen, taking the small percentage of cedar trees which are found in the forests which are cut in the process of the larger operations.

The Senator from Minnesota said that because of the activity in the building trades we ought to put shingles on the free list. I do not know but what I would be willing to agree to that, although I do not think I would even under those conditions, if that principle should be applied all along the line, if it should be applied to every industry and to every community. If we put shingles upon the free list because of the demand for building, then we should put brick on the free list; then we should put cement upon the free list——

Mr. KELLOGG. I am in favor of doing that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then we should put structural steel, which is used in building operations, on the free list, whose producers have profited so under protective theory. Then we can talk about putting the shingle industry, a comparatively small and yet substantial and important industry, upon the free list. But let us apply the same principle to both. Let us have a uniform system of protection or have none at all, because, as I said, it seems that the only basis upon which the protective theory can be justified at all is as a public benefit, as a general policy, so that every man who can supply the American market by his industry shall get the benefit of it. But if we say that because the Minnesota lumberman has cut out his pine and taken the millions which he has accumulated under the protective theory into British Columbia and employed the cheap labor of that country, that he shall come here now because he is differently situated and have the American market opened up to the products of the cheap foreign labor which he is attempting to exploit, it becomes a matter of influence and favoritism. We can not justify giving him that advantage by sacrificing the principle of protection on the Pacific coast and at the same time give the benefit of a tariff to others who are differently situated merely because individually and locally they may be able to profit by it. If the tariff is a local question, as was said by a distinguished statesman at one time, though they laughed him out of the campaign because of his assertion that it was, we may as well cease to pretend that it is a matter of national principle. Unfortunately, in some of its manifestations in the process of making a tariff bill, it would seem to be a local question and a very sordid question.

But it ought not to be a sordid question; it ought not to be a local question in the eyes of the lawmakers of the Nation who are framing a law to put into effect a great policy for 110,000,000 of people. It ought to be a national question; it ought to be a universal policy extending its benefits and its protection to every man underneath the flag, or else we should wipe it from the statute books.

That is what we are asking for, Mr. President, in behalf of one of the great industries of the Pacific coast, where conditions of living are more expensive, perhaps, even than they are in some of the other States; where American standards prevail; where men are attempting to raise their families under those conditions which develop good citizenship. That is the basis upon which we have heretofore protected the American laboring man.

We are not asking this in the interest of any great trust or of any great capital investment. For the men who work in the shingle mills—and you may see many upon the Pacific coast bearing upon their bodies the marks of the dangerous occupation in which they have been engaged, with their fingers and hands mutilated, and yet who find it necessary that they should engage in that industry in order that they should be able to support themselves and their families—we are asking the benefits of the policy which we are giving to others in this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the record, the House placed on shingles a duty of 50 cents and the Senate committee have placed shingles on the free list. Is there any opportunity at this time to vote upon a proposition to reduce the duty from 50 cents? May an amendment proposing to fix the rate at 25 cents be offered?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should think that such an amendment would be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the right to move to amend the part of the paragraph which is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. McCUMBER. A motion may be made to fix the rate at any figure the Senate desires.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before a vote is taken upon the committee amendment a motion may be made to amend it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I am perfectly willing to vote for free building materials, iron, steel, steel rails, and structural iron. I have voted for free brick and free cement. Furthermore, there is not any tariff on iron ore, which is produced in my State. I never would support a tariff on iron ore or coal or lumber.

The insinuation of the Senator from Washington that I am opposing a tariff on shingles because Minnesota lumbermen are producing shingles in Canada is without any foundation whatever. I have always been opposed to a tariff on lumber and shingles, and I so stated in speeches in 1909, though I was not in a position to vote on the question, because I was not then a Member of the Senate. There is not a lumberman in my State, as near as I can ascertain by an inquiry, who is manufacturing any shingles in Canada. Furthermore, if all the lumbermen in Minnesota wanted a protective duty on shingles I would not vote for it.

Let us consider this question on its merits. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] says that we are asking protection upon farm products. Mr. President, farm products are produced year after year and century after century from the same land, while timber is being cut off, the hillsides are made barren, and the watercourses are dried up. We should not adopt a national policy that forces or encourages the cutting of American timber. Rather we should adopt a policy that invites the importation of lumber. The farmer in our country is producing his products on land that costs several times what land costs in Canada. Labor is no cheaper, I admit, in Canada. I am in favor generally of the introduction free of duty of the great raw materials. It does not tend to aid manufacturers in this country to prevent lumber, a raw material, from coming in free.

Mr. President, one other suggestion. A very strenuous assault has been made upon the report of the Tariff Commission by the West Coast Lumberman, whose statement has been put into the RECORD, and also by the Senator from the State of Washington. The Tariff Commission, at least, tried to make an impartial and careful investigation.

They show the pains they took, set forth how they made their investigations, and state that they procured the statistics from the manufacturers in Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia. They report in detail as to prices, and it is on that report, which certainly is an intelligent and fair report, that I base the statement that it costs as much, if not more, to produce shingles in British Columbia than in Washington and Oregon, and, the freight rate being equal, the lumbermen in this country do not need any tariff to protect them, and they never have needed it.

Why talk about the lumber interests wanting free trade? It is the farmers and the builders, the millions of people in this country who want cheap material for construction, who are petitioning Congress. No petition will be found here from lumbermen except those who want a tariff on lumber. I suggest to Senators that they read the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the Lumber Trust in the Northwestern States.

Mr. President, the Tariff Commission studied and made a reply to the petition which has been read into the RECORD by the Senator from Washington, in which the Pacific coast shingle manufacturers criticize the findings of the Tariff Commission. I have here—

Memorandum re communication of American shingle manufacturers to United States Tariff Commission on the subject of Tariff Information Survey FL-37: Shingles—

And they reply to the various statements and stand by their original report. They say:

As to whether the survey is superficial or not is, of course, for the reader to judge. Extensive data were collected by an agent in the field, accountants were sent out to check the accuracy of the data by inspection of the books of mills both in Canada and the United States, and much painstaking and laborious effort was expended in presenting and interpreting the data. The work was certainly not hasty.

As to costs, they reiterate their statement that the comparative costs are the same in British Columbia and this country, and they state——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any figures as to the comparative cost of production of wheat in Canada and Minnesota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I can not answer as to that. Those figures have been produced in the Senate, I think, by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be willing to vote for free wheat?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I am not willing to vote for free wheat. The farmer is producing the food of the Nation on his little farm by the sweat of his brow, and if there is any man in the United States who is entitled to protection it is he.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator, but unless protection is universal in its application it is a fraud.

Mr. KING. It is a fraud anyway.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think that is true. We have never, at least not for many years, had any protection on the production of iron ore or coal, and that is not a fraud. We should not have such protection.

The Tariff Commission say—I shall ask to have this whole report in reply placed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state to the Senator that I have already done that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well; I withdraw my request. I wish, however, to read one word. The commission say:

9. The statement, "so far as averages shown above are representative, the Canadians have no advantage in labor costs," is strictly in conformity with facts. The schedules submitted showed labor cost to average $1.15 per 1,000 for the United States and $1.16 per 1,000 for British Columbia.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the representative of the commission who made this report deny the fact that the employees in the shingle mills of British Columbia work from 9 to 10 hours a day, while those in the Washington and Oregon mills work only 8 hours for a day's wage?

Mr. KELLOGG. He does not state that, but I am informed that many of the employees in the Washington shingle mills to-day are working 10 hours.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to know who informed the Senator to that effect.

Mr. KELLOGG. The information is exactly as reliable as that contained in the telegram of the lumbermen sent to the Senator from Washington from his State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have more confidence in the telegram I received than I have in the Senator's information. Of course, I have no personal knowledge of the subject——

Mr. KELLOGG. Nor have I.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But when the representative of a great organization sends me a public telegram about a fact which must be notorious one way or the other, whichever way it may be, and the whole population practically must know it, I can not imagine that he is misstating the facts.

Mr. KELLOGG. But, Mr. President, this commission took the pay rolls of the mills in Canada and the pay rolls of the mills in Washington. They did not rely on the mere statements in telegrams. Here is their statement:

From the pay rolls above referred to we extract the following statements:

I presume this is a sample.

From an American mill: "Paid 32 cents for sawing 'perfections'; 28 cents for sawing all others." From a Canadian mill, "White sawyers, 33 cents per 1,000; Chink, 29 cents per 1,000; perfections, 31 cents per 1,000."

As the commission say, the difference is not considerable.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That shows quite a difference and bears out to a certain extent——

Mr. KELLOGG. Very little difference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The difference between 32 cents and 29 cents—that is the difference.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is that much difference between the white labor in the United States and the Chinese labor in Canada, according to the statement presented by the Senator from Minnesota himself.

Mr. KELLOGG. Furthermore, Mr. President, it is not true that the labor in Canada is all Chinese. In fact, this report shows that the larger part of it is white.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What do they mean by "Chink"?

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not say all of them are Chinese. It says:

From a Canadian mill, white sawyers, 33 cents per thousand.

They are reporting on Canadian mills. Furthermore, the report says that the pay roll of another shingle mill from August 16 to 21, 1920, shows that 57 per cent were white, and the examination of the commission shows that the labor in Canada is not all oriental labor by any manner of means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That would show, according to the statement the Senator has just uttered, that 43 per cent of the labor in that mill was oriental.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is not the average in Canada. Furthermore, I think it will be found that an equal percentage of oriental labor is working in the mills of Washington and Oregon, and that the statement that there is not a single oriental employee in those mills will not be substantiated by the facts.

It was stated here that the Washington and Oregon mills are idle. The statements of their own lumbermen in their own papers and in their own telegrams show that they are working at from 90 per cent to 110 per cent of normal capacity.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, apropos of the point the Senator is just discussing, the Tariff Commission, after examining the costs in Canada and in the United States and after considering the question of the oriental labor which in part is used in Canada, reach the conclusion that the costs in British Columbia are greater than in the United States, and use this language:

> The above comparison by averages shows the cost to be slightly greater in British Columbia than in Washington-Oregon—$5.04 per 1,000 as compared with $4.77.

Then they discuss the question of the superiority of the white labor over the Japanese or the oriental labor; and, of course, everybody knows that the white man does more work, particularly in the lumber regions, than does the oriental.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why do they employ the orientals, then?

Mr. KING. There are many reasons which must suggest themselves to the Senator; but obviously the Tariff Commission does not find that they employed the oriental because of the cheapness of the labor, because, as a matter of fact, it costs more in Canada than it does in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not surprised that the Senator from Utah should rely upon the Tariff Commission for his information; but I am greatly astonished that anybody on this side of the Chamber should rely upon it, because it has been utterly rejected on this side from the beginning of the framing of this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have relied on a great deal of information I have gotten from the Tariff Commission, and I still rely on it.

Mr. President, I am not arguing against the general principle of protection. There are many industries in this country, however, that do not need protection, and I am not going to vote for protection for them. I voted against a great many items in this bill because I thought the rates were too high. If there are any other items where I think the rates are too high, or any other items where I think there should not be any protection, I am going to vote against them. I am convinced now, and have been convinced for many years, that it is a wrong policy for us to protect by tariff duties the lumber industry in this country, and force the destruction of our forests. It ought to be our policy to import all the lumber we can, and especially should that policy be adopted to-day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to make a few observations upon two or more factors that I think have been overlooked by the Tariff Commission in their report, and also with regard to a statement as to the transportation of shingles made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. President, I know from personal observation and general understanding of the subject that most of the shingles move by water through the Panama Canal. All of the shingles used in the eastern markets go that way. That, standing by itself, means nothing in this argument; but when you consider the other factor in this question—that the cedar timber in British Columbia runs to the sea, while in Oregon and Washington it is found in the mountains, away back a hundred or more miles from the sea—you will understand then that the cedar mills operating in Oregon and Washington must pay a cartage from away back in the mountains to the seashore, whereas in British Columbia the mountains are covered with cedar from the mild hills along the western slope of British Columbia down to the ocean; so the element of transportation is noteworthy in favor of the mills located in Canada. Furthermore, by rail the transportation rate is just as cheap over the Canadian railroads as it is over the northern railroads in this country.

Then there is another fundamental proposition which evidently the Tariff Commission did not take into consideration in this matter, and that is the capital cost. Anyone who is familiar with the Crown lands of British Columbia knows that nearly all the cedar is on the public domain, and those who operate sawmills have a capital investment not only in the mills but in the auxiliaries necessary to their operation, whereas in the United States nearly all the cedar that is milled is taken from private holdings. These holdings are subject to taxation. For many, many years these cedar trees are conserved and preserved before being made into shingles. During that period of time immense sums of money are paid by the owners into the treasuries of the different counties where the timber is located. This item enters into the cost of production. These private owners must pay interest to the institution which carries them, or from which they have borrowed their money, whereas in Canada the timber belongs to the public and is not subject to taxation. There is no investment. The Government owns the property. The operator acquires the timber by lease or through royalties. That item in itself is sufficient to indicate to anyone conversant with the subject that from the standpoint of capital investment and the standpoint of transportation alone it is impossible for the operators in the United States on the Pacific coast and in the New England States to compete with the Canadian situation.

Mr. President, I remember very well a few years ago, in 1915, on a very pleasant trip through the Panama Canal, seeing a great many vessels loaded with shingles going through the Panama Canal, all of the shingles having been manufactured in British Columbia. In the same year, 1915, I made a trip by automobile from Portland, Oreg., to Seattle. In that region there are perhaps a dozen shingle mills, every one of which was closed down and idle. If these lumber mills can compete with those of Canada, why were they not operated when across the line every mill in British Columbia was operating at full capacity? Those are obvious facts that I have seen, as anyone can see who goes upon the ground.

Further, Mr. President, there is no use in quibbling over facts. Anyone who has been into British Columbia knows that the mills operate there with oriental labor, mainly Hindus. There are literally thousands of them, also Japanese and some Chinese, whereas in Oregon and in California—particularly by reason, I might say, of class prejudice—none of those mills are operating with orientals; and I say to the Senator from Minnesota that there is no data extant that will show that the mills of Oregon and Washington are being operated with other than American citizens. That is an obvious proposition that anyone who goes upon the ground can see for himself.

Mr. President, while I concede that the tariff is a local proposition, the people operating those mills in these two States and in Idaho and Maine and in other parts of the country are as much entitled to protection in this industry as any other industry in the country. This talk of conservation is foolish. The cedar that is left is found intermixed with the Douglas fir, constituting a ratio of about 20 to 80, and that will all perish if those mills are not permitted to operate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield, gladly.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator how much higher shingles are now than they were in 1914 and 1915?

Mr. McNARY. I am not a statistician. I do not look after figures all the time. The Senator has those figures in mind. I am speaking about the general situation as I know it actually to exist. I do not know what the figures are, and I do not care anything about them.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator says he is not a statistician and he does not carry the figures in his mind, and the inference is that he does not care anything about them. It does seem to me that the Senator would be serving the people of the United States better if he would be interested in determining whether or not he is supporting a measure that increases the burdens and the taxes upon the people. The facts are that the lumbermen have formed organizations and combinations throughout the United States, and their conspiracies have come under the denouncement of the Supreme Court of the United States in one case; and shingles, as the Senator must know, have responded to this advancement which the lumbermen, by reason of their conspiracies, have effectuated.

Mr. McNARY. I do not know whether that is a fact or not. I doubt it very much.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. Gladly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will state to the Senator that the authority I have was collected from the Western Pine Association, of Portland, Oreg. The figures and other data secured as to labor are from the Western Pine Association and the British Columbia Timber Council, which reported 6,000 orientals engaged in the lumber business in Washington and Oregon and 4,680 in British Columbia. Of course, there is a very much larger business in the State of Washington and Oregon than in British Columbia; that is true; but that is the report that I have.

Mr. MCNARY. What is the date, I ask the Senator, of that report?

Mr. KELLOGG. 1921, I think.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, this subject has been very thoroughly covered. I feel certain that when we get down to a condition of normality in this country the shingle mills can not operate without due protection from the competition, which is ruinous, in British Columbia. I think it is fair that the people having their money invested in sawmills and in factories where shingles are made, who have large timber holdings, and who pay taxes upon them, should be protected in this industry as much as in any other industry; and it is not fair to argue that because there are a great many farmers who put shingles on their barns and poor people who put shingles on their dwellings in the cities and villages we should not have protection on shingles. That same argument, if applied locally, would affect every item and every schedule in a tariff bill.

I do hope that a due measure of regard for the interests of the shingle men will be shown by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I stated that the cost of sawing in the United States, according to the most recent information I have, is 31 cents, and that it is 21 cents in British Columbia. I do not want that to create the impression that that is all of the labor involved. That is only one element. In addition to that is the packing, which costs 24 cents in the United States and 12 cents in British Columbia, making a difference of 22 cents a thousand for packing and sawing. In addition to that, of course, there has to be taken into consideration the difference in the cost of the raw material and of the handling in various other ways. I would like to have the privilege of printing at the conclusion of my remarks the telegram from which I have quoted.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., June 25, 1922.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Washington and Oregon investment in shingle mills, exclusive of stumpage, is $16,425,000. Impossible to get British Columbia shingle investment figures. Since tariff has been under consideration they have quit giving us information, although we are able to keep close tab on their log and labor costs. Since my telegram of June 17 American logs have advanced and British Columbia logs declined. Cedar logs now costing American shingle mills $22.65 per thousand feet and costing British Columbia shingle mills $17.38. In raw material alone this gives British Columbia mills an advantage of 75 cents per thousand shingles in the grade of perfections, an advantage of 62 cents in the grade of perfects, 52 cents in the grade of extra clears, and 48 cents in the grade of star aye stars. American mills are paying American sawyers 31 cents per thousand shingles in the making of perfections, while oriental sawyers in British Columbia for the same grade are getting but 21 cents. American packers on perfections are getting 24 cents as against 12 cents in British Columbia. On perfects American mills are paying 28 cents for sawing and 22 cents for packing, as against 19 cents sawing and 12 cents packing in British Columbia. For clears and star aye stars American mills are paying 27 cents for sawing and 21 cents for packing, as against 19 cents for sawing and 12 cents for packing in British Columbia. All labor in American shingle mills is white and working 8 hours a day, while virtually all like labor in British Columbia mills is oriental, working 10 hours a day. For all comparable grades British Columbia manufacturers are now selling in American markets for practically the same prices as American manufacturers, though they occasionally take advantage of their lower raw material and labor costs by unloading surplus at lower than American mill prices. The British Columbia Drafting & Blue Print Co., of 413 Granville Street, Vancouver, British Columbia, has issued a publication on British Columbia timber, which shows that Minnesota people contract leases and licenses in British Columbia amounting to 458,240 acres and that North Dakota people control 71,040 acres.

ROBERT B. ALLEN.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the principle of tariff duties is to be sustained at all, there is no reason why this particular commodity should go upon the free list. I rose principally to say, however, that I should not want to vote for the rate which was established by the House, and if I am given an opportunity I shall vote for a rate of 30 or 25 cents a thousand. I think it would perhaps meet the exigency as it exists in the Northwest, and I do not believe in placing the duty any higher than is absolutely necessary in order to meet it. I do not want to take the matter out of the hands of the Senator who has it in charge, but when the opportunity comes I shall vote for a duty, but for a lower rate than that adopted by the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORAH. I understand if my amendment is not moved at this time, it will not be relevant at all, and I have to make the motion in order to have a vote upon it. I move, therefore, to amend, in line 12, page 93, after the word "shingles," by striking out "50" and inserting "25," so as to read "shingles, 25 cents per thousand"; and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before a vote is taken I want to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a report covering certain activities of trade associations composed of the Douglas fir loggers and lumber manufacturers of the Pacific coast. This report has not been given publicity; at least such publicity as it deserves. It was submitted by the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. There it has slumbered, so far as I am advised, since June 9, 1921.

This communication by the Federal Trade Commission shows the pernicious activities, the conspiracies, and combinations of certain lumber dealers and loggers and loggers' associations upon the Pacific coast. For instance, it is stated in the report:

Between 1915 and 1920 wholesale quotations on fir lumber increased from 300 to 500 per cent, and most items doubled in price after the armistice.

The organizations referred to are the loggers, loggers' associations, lumber dealers, and lumber producers of the State of Oregon and the State of Washington. They increased their prices from 300 to 500 per cent, and after the armistice doubled them. I read further:

Notwithstanding substantial reductions since the spring of 1920, on some items quotations still range about as they were in May and June, 1919—

When they were from 300 to 500 per cent above normal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it must necessarily follow that the Canadian rates also increased at the same ratio, or they would have sent lumber into this country.

Mr. KING. I fancy the inference drawn by the Senator is entirely warranted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator will bear in mind that Oregon and Washington are not asking for a duty on lumber.

Mr. KING. I understand; but the Senators from Oregon and Washington are asking for a duty on shingles, and they are produced in the same States as the organizations contained in this report are operating.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the statement the Senator is quoting relates to lumber.

Mr. KING. Yes; and the lumber industry of the Northwest, and to the loggers. I read further:

On substantial portions of the production, present quotations are still more than double the October, 1915, prices. Fir logs are quoted as of May, 1921, at prices as the wartime maximum, and which the loggers continued in force as the minimum until June, 1919.

Another finding of the commission is as follows:

The loggers and lumber manufacturers of the Douglas fir region are organized for the purpose of taking concerted action on the prices of logs and lumber, supporting the prices so fixed by means of concerted restriction of production

This report shows a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Why the Attorney General or some official of the Government has not proceeded against these illegal organizations is something I can not understand. I read further:

They have been engaged in such activities for 20 years or more. As production concentrates in fewer and stronger hands, the control of these organizations over the market becomes more and more effective.

Third. The ownership of standing timber in the Douglas fir region, the chief source of the Nation's reserve supply of lumber, is concentrated in the hands of a comparatively few strong concerns. The organized efforts of lumber producers to control prices are based upon their ability to control production; and control of timber is the key to control of production.

Fourth. The relation between the fir log and lumber markets is such that ordinary manufacturing profits tend to be absorbed in the price of logs and the valuation of timber, particularly on falling wholesale lumber markets. The frequent and present claims of unprofitable mill prices are largely explainable by the collusive action of loggers and timber-owning mills in enhancing the value of logs and standing timber.

Fifth. The success of the Douglas fir loggers and manufacturers' concerted efforts to advance prices in 1919 was threatened by the importation of Canadian logs—

I wish Senators would listen to this—and led to efforts to prevent such importation. Failing in this, the British Columbia loggers became affiliated with the American associations and adopted the latters' prices.

So, of course, there was no reduction of prices in the lumber products coming from the section of the United States referred to in this report.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator the figures showing the increase in wages for the loggers and for the timber workers from 1914 to 1921 or 1922?

Mr. KING. No; I have not.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the increase was, but I know it was very large.

Mr. KING. There were great increases during the war. I think the wages were fixed largely by the War Industries Board here in Washington, which seemed to have control over production and wages and everything else all over the United States.

Resuming reading from the report:

Sixth. In addition to a similar exchange between fir and southern pine manufacturers, prompt notice of price action is given each other by the fir manufacturers and those of western pine, for the purpose and with the effect of securing harmonious price action by both groups.

It would seem that there could scarcely be a clearer case of violation of the Sherman antitrust law than that which is furnished in this report. The fir producers and the pine producers furnished notices almost daily, through agencies, in order that they might prevent any competition.

Further on in the report it is shown that whenever there was possibility of competition through overproduction, or production approximating the demand, then production ceased or was diminished in order that the high and extortionate prices might be maintained.

Again reading from the report:

Despite the fact that retail prices on lumber in January, 1921, had not been reduced proportionately to the decline in wholesale prices, the manufacturers joined hands with the retailers in an advertising campaign to revive buying, which, if successful, will tend to prevent such a reduction in retail prices.

Reference is made to the organizations of producers in the Douglas fir region and the price activities of West Coast Lumbermen's Association and the manner in which they maintained prices. Excerpts from minutes and letters, much the same as in the Hardwood Lumber Co. case, which came under the review of the Supreme Court of the United States recently, are presented in this report. I read further from the report:

Between July 8 and July 12, 1919, a number of the leading fir manufacturers issued discount sheets making uniform advances of from $3 to $10 per thousand on fir, and as high as $20 per thousand on cedar siding. It was probably to these advances that H. S. Dewey, sales manager of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., of Chicago, referred in a night letter of July 14 to R. B. Allen, secretary of the West Coast Association.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator is evidently offering this for the purpose of throwing some light on the duty on shingles, which is the question before us. The duty on all lumber provided in the pending bill is just the same as under the Underwood law.

Mr. KING. I understand that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And, of course, what the Senator is talking about is some sort of a trust or combination. It was not built up under a tariff, because there is no tariff at present. The Senator is familiar with that?

Mr. KING. I am familiar with the law.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am trying to find out what bearing this has upon the duty on shingles.

Mr. KING. I concede that the report does not directly affect the shingle industry, except in so far as manufacturers of shingles cooperated with the organizations referred to in this report. The report does show that those engaged in the lumber industry of the Northwest took advantage of the war, formed combinations and conspiracies to raise prices to unreasonable heights, and that they are still maintaining such high prices. The shingle men, if they did not directly affiliate with those illegal organizations, were in close cooperation and took advantage of the situation and raised their prices to levels very much higher than those existing before the war, and they are still maintaining those high prices.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Suppose all that be true; what had the tariff to do with it? There is no tariff duty on shingles.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And there is no tariff on lumber, and the committee is not proposing any. The costs here are comparable to the costs in Canada, and if the trust has operated in the United States, it must also have operated in the same way in Canada.

Mr. KING. I think probably the Senator's deductions are correct.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Then I can not understand what the argument of the Senator has to do with the tariff on shingles.

Mr. KING. It has to do with the tariff on shingles only in this respect, that the lumber manufacturers and the loggers' associations of the Northwest—and I include within that general designation those who produce shingles—during the war raised their prices to levels that were unprecedented. Combinations were formed which were violative of the Sherman antitrust law. Their prices were so high and their combinations so oppressive that they came under the cognizance of the Federal Trade Commission, who made an investigation and submitted this report to which I am calling the attention of the Senate. I intended to ask to have it printed and also to have a copy referred to the Attorney General with the hope that he would take the necessary steps to bring before the courts those who, according to the report, have broken the law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me right there, I want to say that the lumber men contest very vigorously the statements and conclusions in that report, and they have asked the Attorney General to investigate and take whatever steps he finds the facts to warrant. I have myself transmitted a telegram from the association—I know nothing as to the facts—asking the Attorney General and inviting the strictest investigation and prosecution if warranted.

Mr. KING. If anyone will read this report I believe he will reach the conclusion that prosecution is not only warranted, but demanded. When prices are increased from 300 to 500 per cent as a result of combination and concerted action, when a central organization determines largely the prices which shall be charged, I think there is ample reason for the invocation of the criminal provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. President, I submit a request to the Senate to have printed as a public document this report of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to the printing of the report, but I think the request of the Senator ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing. That is the ordinary practice.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that. The report has been before one committee for a year, and was lost in the shuffle, if I may be permitted the language of the street. I have asked several times to have something done with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Utah will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KING. I hope the Committee on Printing will promptly make a report.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may vote first upon the 50-cent rate, as proposed by the House, and that then we may vote upon the motion of the Senator from Idaho to reduce it to 25 cents.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that will be a little difficult. This comes in the form of an amendment. The House placed the rate at 50 cents per thousand. The Senate committee amendment proposes to strike out that provision. Therefore a vote upon the committee amendment would be a vote to place the article upon the free list, as I understand the situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A vote against the committee amendment would be a vote in favor of the 50-cent rate. My request is that we take that vote first, and then that we be allowed to vote, in case the committee amendment shall be adopted, upon the motion of the Senator from Idaho, if the Chair shall hold that motion is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the question be first upon the committee amendment and then upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On both these questions the yeas and nays have been ordered. Under those circumstances, does the Senator desire to call for a quorum?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	France	Johnson	McCormick
Borah	Frelinghuysen	Jones, Wash.	McCumber

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out paragraph 408, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire whether the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and allow my vote to stand.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. It is quite evident to my mind that it would be a mere waste of time to propose another rate of duty on this article. I shall not, therefore, press my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Idaho withdraws his amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 93, paragraph 408, line 12, in place of the numeral "50," I move to substitute the numeral "25," so as to make the rate of duty on shingles 25 cents a thousand instead of 50 cents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator from Washington offering the amendment, but I should like to have an understanding as to the parliamentary situation. This paragraph has gone out of the bill, and I have understood that we were considering only committee amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator from Alabama was not present when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] proposed to substitute a 25-cent rate instead of a 50-cent rate on shingles, and unanimous consent was obtained for a vote upon the 50-cent rate, and then for a vote upon the 25-cent rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood that there was unanimous consent obtained by the Senator from Idaho to offer an amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Washington wishes to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of his amendment, of course, while I am opposed to it, I shall not object; but I wanted some understanding as to where we enter the domain of individual amendments and where we abandon the consideration of purely committee amendments, because, of course, there are a number of us on this side of the aisle who desire, when the proper time comes, to propose some individual amendments ourselves. I shall not object to the Senator's request if he asks unanimous consent but I do not want it to be understood that when a committee amendment is disposed of a Senator on the other side may offer his own amendment and we on this side be barred from doing so.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me I desire to explain the situation. The question naturally comes first on the committee amendment to strike out the paragraph proposing a duty of 50 cents and to place the article upon the free list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Washington desired to vote merely upon the question between a 50-cent duty and the free list; and after that was voted upon, then he asked unanimous consent that he might have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho proposing a 25-cent duty. As I thought it would make but little difference which one we voted upon first, as the Senator would have the right to ask for a 25-cent duty if he so desired, we consented to that. I hope there will be no objection and that Senators will allow the question to be voted on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the situation as it is stated by the Senator from North Dakota, but unanimous consent was granted to the Senator from Idaho and he has withdrawn his motion. The paragraph is no longer before the Senate; it is disposed of; it is out of the bill; but if the Senator from Washington desires to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment I shall not object at this time, but I think in ordinary fairness we ought to consider individual amendments when they are reached.

Mr. BORAH. If by reason of the fact that I asked for unanimous consent to offer the motion I may offer it, I will be very glad to do so. I simply withdrew it because, as I supposed, it was in the interest of time. I will, however, Mr. President, avail myself of the unanimous consent which I obtained, and I move to insert "25 cents" in lieu of "50 cents" in line 12, on page 93. That will give us an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Idaho withdraws his withdrawal.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I withdraw my withdrawal.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I suggest, in view of the parliamentary situation, it will be necessary for the Senator to move to restore the entire paragraph, because the Senate has already voted to strike out all of the text as well as the rate of 50 cents. If the Senator will make a motion now to restore the entire paragraph with a rate of 25 cents, that will be the proper course to pursue.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move to insert on page 93, after line 11, the following amendment:

PAR. 408. Shingles, 25 cents per thousand.

Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last ballot to the effect that the Senator from Florida with whom I am paired would vote as I am about to vote on this question, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. Making the same announcement as on the last vote with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. STANLEY. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—19.

Borah	Gooding	McKinley	Shortridge
Bursum	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Cameron	Johnson	Oddie	Warren

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the tobacco schedule, paragraph 601, page 97.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first amendment of the committee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 97, beginning on line 15, Schedule 6, "tobacco and manufactures of," on line 17 the committee proposes to strike out "50" and to insert "35," so as to read: "Wrapper tobacco, and filler tobacco when mixed or packed with more than 35 per cent of wrapper tobacco," etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is a very considerable change from the present law, which provides for 15 per cent of wrapper tobacco instead of 50 per cent, as provided in the House bill, and 35 per cent, as provided in the Senate committee amendment; but I am under the impression that the representatives of the tobacco industry have not made any serious complaint with reference to that particular part of the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that that change is recommended by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, only as to the extent of the mixture?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am ready for a vote on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 20 it is proposed to strike out "$2.10" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2.35," so as to read—and all leaf tobacco the product of two or more countries or dependencies when mixed or packed together, if unstemmed, $2.35 per pound.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I ask that the Senate disagree to the two amendments on line 20 whereby "$2.10" and "$2.75" are stricken out and "$2.35" and "$3" are inserted in lieu thereof. The matter received a great deal of consideration by the Senate committee, and at this morning's session it was agreed to go back to the lower House rates.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator now proposes to restore the House rates.

Mr. MCCUMBER. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who I know is deeply interested in this subject, if he thinks that in present conditions the industry in his State—and his is the chief State in which this wrapper tobacco is grown—requires that degree of protection?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, this tobacco is grown in Connecticut and in Massachusetts and in Florida and in Georgia. Large quantities of it are grown in Georgia.

Mr. SIMMONS. A little of it is grown in Florida.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that the most careful estimates that the committee could get—and I think they were accurate—indicate that the increase should be at least 50 cents a pound, if not a dollar a pound, in order to equal the difference in the production cost; but I realize that there is very strong opposition to any increase in the tariff on wrapper tobacco, emanating, as it always has, from the importers and the cigar makers of the country. They have many friends in the Senate. The farmers are not supplied with funds or with friends sufficiently strong to combat this combination of the importers and the cigar makers, and I will say to the Senator that the increase in this rate is only half a mill to a cigar. That is all it is. Two pounds of this tobacco wraps a thousand cigars, and the increase of 25 cents a pound is just one-half a mill to a cigar.

Before I asked for any increase in this rate I consulted with the customs officials and experts, and they told me that the $2.35 rate was entirely justified as a revenue rate; and it seemed to me that under the circumstances there could be no objection to this slight increase on the part of the cigar makers because, while I want the cigar maker well paid, he gets to-day much more for wrapping the tobacco around the cigar than the farmer gets for raising it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course I think the Senator is to be commended for his moderation. We understand that he generally gets all that he wants, and he did get from the committee $3 a pound, I believe, on the stemmed tobacco.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the amendment that the committee originally reported.

Mr. McLEAN. The committee recommended an increase of 50 cents, and now cuts it down to 25 cents. Realizing the necessity of getting all that I can under the circumstances and feeling that this $2.10 will not be protective——

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a little bit lower than the emergency tariff rate, I believe.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Again I commend the Senator from Connecticut for his moderation.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know whether I should be commended or not, but I have learned from experience that it is not worth while to waste his time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am entirely familiar with the fact that the Senator has generally been able to get on this tobacco whatever he has asked from the committee.

Mr. McLEAN. That is because my requests are always reasonable. The Senator will note that the importations of Sumatra tobacco have increased very rapidly.

Mr. SIMMONS. That, however, was said rather in a jesting spirit. What I want to ask the Senator is, will he not tell the Senate, if he knows, what is the price of the imported article against which he is asking this rate of protection?

Mr. McLEAN. It comes over in a great many grades and qualities, as the Senator knows, and the quality regulates the price.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking about that quality of wrapper which competes with the Connecticut-grown wrapper.

Mr. McLEAN. The price will run from less than a dollar to a dollar and a half—two dollars—a pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was under the impression that it was selling for over $2 a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that at this time of the year, when the importers and the jobbers have bought the 1921 New England crop at their own price, they will raise the price of Sumatra tobacco to $6 or more a pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. The imported article?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and next year, when the buying season for the Connecticut crop is on, they will sell the Sumatra at a profit of 25 per cent. Later they will make 100 per cent if the trade will bear it. The Senator knows that this tobacco trade is handled by very few men, and if he were engaged in raising wrapper tobacco, as his people are engaged in raising the other kinds, he would realize that the American grower is practically at the mercy of the importers and the jobbers.

Mr. SIMMONS. When we were dealing, in the conference committee on the emergency tariff bill, with the Sumatra wrapper grown in the Senator's State, the statement was made that this particular grade of tobacco was selling in the American market for $5 a pound. Can the Senator tell me what it is selling for in the American market to-day?

Mr. McLEAN. The Sumatra?

Mr. SIMMONS. That raised in Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. As the Senator knows, it depends entirely upon the quality of the leaf. Perhaps 10 or 20 or 25 or 30 per cent of the plant, if it has 18 leaves, will be suitable for these wrappers, and they will bring anywhere from $2 to $2.50, and a few of them sell as high as $4 a pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. At this time?

Mr. McLEAN. At this time, if there is any unsold.

Mr. SIMMONS. Tobacco is selling for somewhat less than it did at the time we were in conference on the emergency tariff bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know of anyone who has received more than $4 or $4.25 for this season's crop. That is a very small percentage of the plant.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to indulge in any discussion of this question, because we have had this question up repeatedly, and the Senator from Connecticut always gets what he wants for it. It does seem to me that this rate is very high, taking the statement of the Senator from Connecticut that the foreign article is selling at $1.50 a pound, which I think is probably a little below market rather than above it, because I have been advised that it is selling for about $2 a pound, and I think the statistics will bear out the statement that the average importations are invoiced at about $2 a pound. To be allowed a duty of $2.75 a pound as a protection against a foreign product which sells for only $2 a pound, or $1.50, as the Senator says, is affording pretty steep protection.

It is true that it is a small article of commerce. I believe the Tariff Commission says it is grown in Connecticut, and in one other place, in the vicinity of Quincy, Fla., and that the annual output ranges from six to eight million pounds, a mere bagatelle, it is true; but it is important in the fact that it enters as an element into the cost of nearly all the higher priced cigars sold in this country and adds tremendously to their price. But whether it be a small article of commerce or a large article of commerce, according to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut that the foreign article sells at $1.50 a pound, his duty of $2.75 is approaching 200 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. One dollar and eighty cents is the average price. Of course, it sells for anywhere from 50 cents up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose the foreign article should sell for 50 cents. The lowest duty here is upon the unstemmed, and I will assume that the foreign article is unstemmed, and the lowest duty here is $2.10 upon the unstemmed. Then it would be worse. You would have a duty of $2.10 on an article that sells for 50 cents a pound, according to the last statement of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, I could take the time of the Senate and discuss this question at length. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina is very well informed, judging from the statement he has just made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not profess to be well informed about this item.

Mr. McLEAN. A very large percentage of the New England crop is not shade grown. We raise in New England 40,000 acres or more. There will be about 10,000 acres of the shade grown, and the rest will be what is called the sun-grown tobacco, which is also used for wrappers. It is called "Havana seed" and "Broadleaf," and a very small percentage of these leaves to the plant are suitable for wrappers. They are so much heavier than the shade grown and the Sumatra that it takes many more pounds of the leaf to wrap a thousand cigars, and it is for these farmers who are engaged in raising the outside or sun-grown tobacco that I appeal to the Senate. I think too much stress has been laid upon this tariff as a protection to the shade-grown tobacco. It is with the farmers who raise the outside tobacco, which is suitable for wrappers, that the cheaper Sumatra tobacco comes in direct competition. The number of pounds of the sun grown required for 1,000 cigars costs perhaps quite as much as the pounds of the shade tobacco required to wrap 1,000 cigars.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Connecticut did not understand me a little while ago. I was not comparing the duty with the price of the domestic product; I was comparing the duty with the price of the foreign product, and of course the duty has to be compared with the price of the foreign product. I may have misunderstood the Senator from Connecticut, but I understood him to say that some of this tobacco which came in from abroad and competed with some of the tobacco grown in his State sold for as low as 50 cents a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. That is the Holland tobacco.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of the tobacco which would be subject to this duty of $2.10 upon the unstemmed comes from Holland and sells for 50 cents a pound. You would have a duty of $2.10 a pound upon an article that is brought in and invoiced for sale in this country at 50 cents a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. That is because it comes in competition with the American article which costs three or three and a half or four dollars a pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be true; I do not know about that.

Mr. McLEAN. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. But according to the usual way of measuring duties, in the case of the unstemmed tobacco from Holland you would have a duty four times the value of the foreign product upon which it is imposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator must recognize that every country in the world uses tobacco as a means of raising revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in 1918 the equivalent ad valorem duty on wrapper tobacco, unstemmed, was 132 per cent under the Underwood law.

Mr. SIMMONS. It always has been high.

Mr. SMOOT. It is always high.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I am speaking now of the fact that it has been constantly raised since then, and this is a considerable raise. I think the rate in the Underwood law was a very steep one. It was intended as a revenue rate. This is intended also, I take it, partly as a revenue rate and partly as a protective rate. I think it went far enough in the Underwood law. I think tobacco has been the most highly taxed of all the products.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a raise of only 25 cents a pound from existing law. The rate in existing law is $1.85 on unstemmed and $2.50 a pound on stemmed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already congratulated the Senator——

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Utah means the Underwood law, not the existing law. The rate in this bill is no higher than that in the existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. I had overlooked the emergency tariff law. I mean the Underwood law.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a little less than the rate in the emergency tariff law, and while I was congratulating the Senator from Connecticut upon his moderation in allowing that to be done by the committee, still I hoped that he might be willing to return to the rate in the Underwood law, which, I think, is enough on this tobacco.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator know that we import wrapper tobacco from Cuba; that they have 20 per cent off; and that Cuba imposes a duty of $5 a pound upon every pound of tobacco which goes into Cuba, which is an embargo?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, you might illustrate with the revenue duties of some countries of Europe, especially Great Britain. Great Britain imposes exorbitant duties. She raises the most of her revenue by taxing such things as tobacco. But Great Britain is not a producer of tobacco, as we are in this country.

Still, I am not going to take the time of the Senate about this matter, and I am willing that the vote should be taken.

Mr POMERENE. Mr. President, before the question is put I want to move, if I can, to reduce this duty from $2.35 to $1.85, and I do that for this reason: The Senator from Connecticut is most insistent upon this high duty, and he urges in behalf of this amendment the fact that the Connecticut farmer can not raise this tobacco unless he has this duty. In Ohio we have a different situation. As I understand it, we do not raise wrapper tobacco. Most of the tobacco that is raised in Ohio is used as filler.

I have here a letter from Hawes Bros., of Cincinnati, Ohio, who are large tobacco packers. I will read a paragraph of that letter, but before I read it I may say that they were protesting very vigorously against the proposed Senate committee duty of $2.35. They would like to have it reduced to $1.85.

They say:

> We are large packers of Ohio leaf tobacco, which is purchased from the farmers. As practically all this is used as filler in cigars and, we believe, an overwhelming majority is used in cigars bearing Sumatra wrappers, you can recognize, we are sure, the additional burdens and hardships that will be placed not only on the cigar manufacturers of this State and the packers of Ohio leaf tobacco but on the thousands of cigar makers in Ohio and the Ohio tobacco farmers should this unfortunate tremendous rate of duty be finally adopted, particularly in view of the public demand for lower and not for increased prices of cigars.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague notes the paragraph just before the one which he read?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. WILLIS. Does he care to incorporate it in the record?

Mr. POMERENE. It may be incorporated. They say in the previous paragraph that they want $1.85, and add something to the effect that at the very outside the rate should not exceed $2.10, but they are very much opposed to the $2.35 rate.

As I see the situation, it is simply a question as to whether we shall favor the Ohio farmer or the Connecticut farmer in this rate. I recognize the fact further that we have always had a very high duty on tobacco, largely because it was recognized as a legitimate subject for revenue.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that a large portion of the New England crop is used for filler?

Mr. POMERENE. I was not aware of that fact; but I do not know.

Mr. McLEAN. A large percentage of the crop is used for binders and fillers; not much over 20 per cent is suitable for wrappers. Connecticut does not object to the competition of Ohio in raising filler tobacco. The Ohio grower does not come in competition with the Chinese coolies who raise this wrapper tobacco in the Sumatra Islands. That is what Connecticut is asking protection against, and that is all she asks protection against.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Chinese coolies raise that tobacco, they probably raise the filler tobacco as well.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps I am. I have not gone into the question very fully.

Mr. McLEAN. Sumatra tobacco is not fit for fillers.

Mr. POMERENE. But in the discussion of this matter it seems to me that the tobacco raisers of Ohio are entitled to at least the same treatment as the tobacco raisers of Connecticut.

It may be that Ohio's Senators are not quite so winsome in securing the relief which is desired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The tobacco raised in Ohio is of the burley type of tobacco.

Mr. POMERENE. I think so. I say I think so, but perhaps I ought not to say that.

Mr. STANLEY. I think that is true. The first burley tobacco ever grown was the natural tobacco leaf grown by a farmer raising the old green tobacco, which was a very bright plant, in Brown County, Ohio. He kept the seed and raised a hogshead of it, and had great difficulty in selling it. It was of a different quality from any they had ever grown in that vicinity before. This burley tobacco is not affected by any duty. It is true that there are certain Egyptian tobaccos which are brought into this country which are mixed with burley tobacco in making cigarettes, and the mixture has appealed to the taste of the cigarette smokers to such an extent that practically all of the American cigarettes use that mixed tobacco now. So far as the burley tobacco is concerned, they might put $100 a pound duty on it and it would not make any difference.

Mr. POMERENE. Tobacco is raised very largely in the southern part of the State, in Brown and Clermont Counties.

Mr. STANLEY. I have been all through that country.

Mr. POMERENE. And in Montgomery and perhaps Butler County and other counties. It is also raised in the northern part of the State, in Medina County, and some in the northeasterly part of the State.

Mr. STANLEY. It is something like the tobacco raised in Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, where they raise some cigar tobacco.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not fully advised as to that. In my immediate part of the State it is not raised for merchantable purposes.

I simply present this matter for the consideration of the Senate. The statement is made that this tobacco is made very largely for filler purposes, and of course the higher duty they are obliged to pay for wrapper tobacco the more of a burden it is, not only on the cigar industry but on the tobacco industry of Ohio generally. Therefore, I move to strike out the numerals "$2.10" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "$1.85."

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has very pertinently observed that the foreign countries raise a great portion of their revenue from a tax on tobacco, and that is true. At one time, in my opinion, about one-fourth of the French revenues were raised from tobacco. An enormous part of the revenue of the English Government was raised in the Queen's warehouse. There was at one time a duty on tobacco in France of $2 or $3 a pound. The initial tax on tobacco imported to the Queen's warehouse in Great Britain, I think, is about 7 cents a pound now. It is approximately that. The Japanese have a monopoly. Austria had a monopoly until recently. The cases are not parallel. If all the revenue derived from the importation of tobacco went into the Government coffers, if the Government like France and Great Britain, practically—because they really raise no tobacco in Great Britain—and Austria, Spain, and Italy—Italy does the same thing—and Japan had the Regie system, as they call it—that is, the sale of tobacco is prohibited to the citizen, and the Government imports the tobacco and sells it, and the entire revenue from the tobacco goes into the coffers of the Government—we would have a very different situation.

But this is not so in our country. This duty on Sumatra leaf is reflected in the revenues which go into the coffers of the Government only in so far as Sumatra leaf is imported. The summary of tariff information shows that from 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 pounds of the Sumatra leaf is raised in this country. The importations in 1918 were 4,000,000 pounds, and in 1920 were 6,000,000 pounds. The importations from 1918 to 1921, with the exception of the year 1921, have never reached anythink like the amount of the home production. I see no reason for this inordinate protection upon the domestic tobacco.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator note that for the nine months of 1921 we imported 8,500,000 pounds?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; I called attention to that fact. That is the only time when the importations have anything like approached the domestic production. Now, I fail to see why it does not occur even to the most extreme protectionists that there is an inordinate difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and that is entirely indicative of the fact that the industry is not indigenous to this country. If it requires 600 or 700 per cent to produce an article at home in competition with the article abroad, that is evidence of the fact that we are no longer equipped for producing that article. We can produce grapes in Connecticut; we can produce bananas in Connecticut by some hothousing process. If this same tobacco can be raised for 30 or 40 cents a pound abroad and it costs $3 a pound to raise it here, it is evidence to my mind that we are not equipped for raising it here.

Until recently we raised in Kentucky one-third practically of all the tobacco raised in the United States by weight. We are not asking for a dollar of protection. They raise the tobacco by cheap labor in Egypt. In South Africa they raise by cheap nigger labor something like the same quality of tobacco that we do. Tobacco, like wheat, is raised by cheap labor wherever it is raised abroad. But we managed, with our superior equipment and the use of machinery and superior intelligence, not only to raise tobacco here at home utterly unconcerned about a duty but in my section of the country we ship 80 per cent of our tobacco abroad, and it comes in competition with the pauper-raised tobacco of the whole world.

This tobacco, as I understand it, in Connecticut is raised under cloth and under artificial conditions, and a reasonable or even an excessive duty is not objectionable, but to put a duty of $3 a pound upon tobacco worth 40 or 50 cents a pound and compel the consumer to pay that unnecessary and excessive tax is, to my mind, unjustified.

Mr. McLEAN. The extra cost occasioned by the use of the shade put over this tobacco is a very small item per cigar, I will say to the Senator. Their use furnishes a market for something like 50,000,000 yards of cotton cloth every year. It takes about an acre of cotton cloth to cover an acre of tobacco. It costs about 2 cents or less per yard. It enables us to cure a very fine quality of wrapper tobacco. The importers admit that our New England and Georgia and Florida wrapper tobacco is the equal of any tobacco grown in the world. It is a matter of fertilization and chemistry, I will say to the Senator. We are improving the quality every year and the acreage has increased every year. I realize that we must have a very high duty to protect us. We are not getting a duty that will really protect us. This duty of $2.10 per pound is a small item when it is realized that two pounds of that tobacco wraps 1,000 cigars.

I will say to the Senator that we have made no money raising the tobacco during the last two years. It seems to me an economic mistake to discourage the industry to the extent of wiping it out, because in New England and in Georgia and Florida we raise the only wrapper tobacco that is grown in the country, and if that industry is suppressed, then the cigar makers of this country will be at the mercy of the Dutch monopoly. They never lose an opportunity to charge all the trade will bear in this country. It is reported that they are now asking $7 or $8 a pound for that tobacco, probably for its effect upon the cigar makers and Senators. Therefore, I think the customs officials were justified when they said this little increase in the rate was legitimate as a revenue duty.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator does not mean to claim that Sumatra tobacco is sold at one price in one country and at another price in another country by the same concern.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I did not intend to be so understood. I stated as to the price of this tobacco that there are many qualities. As the Senator knows, the lower grade comes in competition with our sun-grown tobacco, and the finer grades come in competition with our shade-grown tobacco, and 8,000,000 pounds at 2 pounds to the thousand represents 4,000,000,000 cigars. It is serious competition. Unless we are protected, the cigar makers will be at the mercy of the importers and they will charge all that the trade will bear. If there were no domestic competition, I think the cigar maker would soon find out his mistake in opposing this little increase of duty.

Mr. STANLEY. As a matter of fact, Sumatra tobacco, as I understand, may be bought anywhere in the world; it is a world commodity; it is sold all over the world.

Mr. McLEAN. No. One may buy this only in the Netherlands, of the Dutch monoply, controlled by the Government, and sold at auction under Government supervision.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand that; I did not say it was raised all over the world, but that the Sumatra leaf is a standard article which is sold all over the world. Sumatra leaf cigars are sold wherever tobacco is used.

Mr. McLEAN. After Sumatra tobacco is wrapped upon the cigar, the cigars are sold everywhere; but the wrapper itself is raised in the island of Sumatra and is sold by the Dutch monoply in the Netherlands.

Mr. STANLEY. It is sold to cigar makers everywhere.

Mr. McLEAN. It is not sold to cigar makers by the Dutch monoply; I wish it were; but is sold to the jobber and the wholesale dealer in leaf tobacco, and they tell the cigar maker that if the tariff duty is raised 25 cents a pound, they will have to raise the price of their tobacco to the cigar maker. It is unreasonable and it is unjust.

If the Senator will pardon me—I do not want to take his time, but this is a good way of arriving at an intelligent understanding of the question. The Senator from Kentucky knows that a few years ago we had what was known as a 5-cent cigar, but those cigars went out of the market. In the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, Representative LONGWORTH and others questioned the dealers as to why, when the Government raised the internal revenue tax on tobacco $2 a thousand, which would be 2 mills on a cigar, the cigar dealer raised the price of the 5-cent cigar 3 cents, and made it an 8-cent cigar. It was very difficult for them to give a satisfactory explanation. As the Senator knows, the cigar dealers raised the price of the 10-cent cigar to 15 cents, and of the 20-cent cigar to 30 cents, making enormous profits. I think the United Cigar Co. pays a dividend of something like 2 per cent a month, and the American Tobacco Co. declared a stock dividend in 1920 or 1921 of 75 per cent. The tobacco stocks are the only stocks which in the hard times of 1920 and 1921, when other industries were languishing, went up. They made more money or as much money then as they had previously done. I do not think it is fair.

I want the cigar maker to get good wages, and I am willing that cigar dealers should make good profits, but the farmer is lucky if he comes out even. The Senator from Kentucky knows that the tobacco growers in Kentucky made a little money during the war, but that later on, owing to combinations among the dealers outside, prices went down. I think the Federal Trade Commission reported that there were extortionate and monopolistic prices exacted by the dealers, while the farmers had their prices lowered and lowered to a ruinous level.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, with reference to the argument which the Senator from Connecticut is just making touching the profits made by the cigar manufacturers, I invite his attention to the following statement in a letter which has just come to me from Michael Ibold, manufacturer of cigars in the city of Cincinnati. He says:

> Also since 1914, from a total of 17,155 manufacturers, 5,659 have gone out of business. These people did not give up a prosperous business but were forced to retire. Since these figures were taken quite a number of additional factories have been closed and several rather large factories among them.

So the manufacturers of cigars have not been particularly prosperous. They are very much interested in having as low a rate of duty on wrapper tobacco as is consistent with the needs of the Government.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Ohio is getting back to the little fellow who was crowded out as usual by the few big concerns. It is the same old story.

Let me call the Senator's attention to one or two other concerns. The United Cigar Stores Co. was incorporated on July 25, 1912, with common stock of $32,865,000 and preferred stock of $4,527,000. Of this capital $21,400,000 is represented by trade-mark and good will and it pays dividends, as I recall, of 2 per cent a month.

It paid a stock dividend of 10 per cent in April, 1920; another stock dividend of 10 per cent in November, 1920. In 1921 its total net income was about $5,000,000.

Waitt & Bond (Inc.) have a capital of $250,000 and machine equipment to manufacture 125,000,000 cigars a year. The company was organized in 1917, and reported a surplus on January 1, 1921, of $614,000. Not much money was lost there in the last few years.

Otto Eisenlohr & Bros., a concern which was incorporated in January, 1916, sold 217,716,000 cigars in 1921 at a net profit of $1,137,638.

So it appears that the big concerns are not losing much money, but they are gradually crowding the little fellows out of business; and when the farmer is crowded so that he will not be able to raise wrappers and the entire control of the wrapper market is thrown into the hands of a few Dutch monopolists, the profits of the big concerns will be larger than they are now and cigars will go sky high.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I am at a loss to see where we are in any very serious danger of a decreased price at the hands of the Dutch monopolists who are now offering this tobacco to us at 50 cents a pound, while we by a duty are proposing arbitrarily to raise it to $3 a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator takes one statement that I make and argues from that. He misunderstood me. There are some qualities that sell for as low as 50 cents a pound, but very little of it. It ranges all the way from 50 cents a pound up.

Mr. SMOOT. The average is over $1.50 a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. The average, as the Senator from Utah says, is over $1.50 a pound or a little more.

Mr. STANLEY. What does our best Sumatra bring here?

Mr. McLEAN. As I have said several times, it depends entirely upon the character of the leaf—its quality.

Mr. STANLEY. With the most adverse season, what is the highest price the Sumatra tobacco brings in the market?

Mr. McLEAN. It is reported that the dealers have notified their customers since they have bought the 1921 American crop at their own prices—I saw a statement to that effect in the newspapers a week ago—that they will have to charge them from $8 to $9 dollars a pound for Sumatra tobacco. There are over 3,500,000 pounds of it in bond. Anticipating the new tariff, they imported nearly 9,000,000 pounds under the old rate of $1.85 a pound, and it was under that old rate that they started this propaganda that they could not lower the price of cigars because Congress had added 50 cents a pound duty on the wrapper.

Mr. STANLEY. Do the Connecticut farmers get eight or nine dollars a pound for the tobacco which they produce?

Mr. McLEAN. I am talking about Sumatra tobacco.

Mr. STANLEY. Sumatra leaf that comes in competition with the imported article is raised in the Senator's State, is it not?

Mr. McLEAN. No; it is a Habana type. The shade-grown tobacco is called Sumatra, but it is a Habana tobacco developed from the Habana type. The Sumatra type comes in direct competition with it.

Mr. STANLEY. With the Connecticut wrapper?

Mr. McLEAN. With the Connecticut wrapper.

Mr. STANLEY. What do the farmers in Connecticut get for their tobacco?

Mr. McLEAN. As I have stated, that depends entirely upon the quality. There will be a few leaves on a plant of 20 leaves for which they can get $3.50 or $4 a pound. The top leaves and seconds they have got to sell for what they will bring, at anywhere from 10 to 20 cents a pound.

Mr. STANLEY. So the Connecticut growers get $3.50 a pound——

Mr. McLEAN. That will be for perhaps 20 per cent of the crop.

Mr. STANLEY. Or $4 a pound, and then the man who brings tobacco in here in competition with it has got to pay $3 duty to meet that competition?

Mr. McLEAN. He can easily do it under the existing circumstances; for, as the record shows, the imports have increased under the duty of $1.85, and the addition of 25 cents a pound is so negligible and inconsequential that it will not affect the trade at all.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up any further time in this discussion. According to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, whether it be just or unjust, our previous history shows that when the duty on tobacco has been increased the increase has been reflected in an additional cost to the consumer amounting to 200 or 300 per cent of the duty. Whether carried on by the American Tobacco Co.—and I hold no brief for them, for I introduced a resolution which resulted in the so-called dissolution of that company, although the dissolution should have been more thorough than it was—or by any other company, that character of profiteering, that character of violation of the Sherman Act is entirely reprehensible. But whether it is right or wrong, we know that these powerful concerns, when the price of the article is increased by taxation, visit it two hundred fold upon the helpless consumer.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to understand why the Senator from Connecticut says that the duty on this tobacco is a matter of small importance. In this country we raise from 800,000,000 to 1,000,000,000 pounds of tobacco, and it is grown in many different sections, for which the grower asks and receives no protection, for the 35 per cent duty on filler tobacco is a pure fiction. But as to another type of tobacco which is grown in Connecticut and which happens to come in competition with Sumatra leaf it is said that it will go to the bowwows if a duty of 200 per cent or 300 per cent—there is no telling how much—is not imposed upon it. It is time that we had a chance to ascertain what we can do with these Dutch monopolists. The duty as it exists is enormous and almost inordinate, being at least 100 per cent over the value of the tobacco, according to any estimate of the Senator, and to increase it is to add, as he has truly said, to the amount of the duty practically 200 or 300 per cent more, because these monopolists, as he has told us, will not bear this burden, but will visit it with an increase of three or four times over upon the users of tobacco and upon the small manufacturers of cigars.

Mr. McLEAN. Then we should stimulate and protect domestic competition, if it is possible.

Mr. President, the duty on the filler of 35 cents a pound is about in proportion to the duty on the wrapper, because it takes from 15 to 20 pounds of filler to make a thousand cigars. The duty must be figured upon some sort of a unit, and of course that unit is the cigar or multiples of cigars; so that there is no disproportion between the duty on the filler and on the wrapper.

Mr. STANLEY. I was referring to the duty on leaf tobacco.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On the same line, line 20, after the words "if stemmed," the committee proposes to strike out "$2.75" and in lieu thereof to insert "$3."

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Senate disagree to that committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On lines 21 and 22 the committee proposes to strike out the following words:

Filler tobacco of the kind known as Turkish, $1 per pound.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to express my respectful surprise at the action of the committee in striking out the words just read. The proposed rate of $1 per pound on so-called "Turkish" tobacco was placed in this bill by the House after due consideration. The hearings are a matter of record. In due season the bill came to the Senate and found its way before our Finance Committee. The hearings before that committee are matters of record with which I would be glad to believe each and every Member of the Senate is familiar. It may well be, however, that they are not, because of the multiplicity of affairs that engage the attention of Senators.

It is not my present purpose to detain the Senate long in discussing this item. If the result of this vote in committee shall be in favor of sustaining the action of the Finance Committee, I purpose reserving the right to review the matter before the Senate, when, if it shall become necessary, it is my present intention to go into the matter somewhat more fully than I now desire to do.

For present purposes, however, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some few outstanding admitted or demonstrated facts. It is not my intention to engage in controversies with my Democratic friends as to the theory of protection or that of so-called free trade, and it embarrasses me to engage in controversy with members of my own house in any attempt on my part to show that they have departed from the elementary, and, I think, sound principles of a protective tariff; but the duty is forced upon me to say a few words.

It is perfectly idle, I suppose, to argue with learned Senators upon the other side as to the theory of protection or that of free trade. Perhaps words are wasted—and I say this with respect—but they are wasted in discussing theories here, because Senators who after years of study, reflection, and experience have come to have a firm belief in a given theory or doctrine are not easily driven from their positions, and up to this moment, during the consideration of this tariff measure, I have not seen any conversions. I remind the Senate, however, that as to items or products certain voluble and more or less vehement free-trade Senators have voted in favor of protection, perhaps upon the theory that it was exceptional, and that by so voting they were not in any wise violating their political faith.

I am a protectionist, however. I believe in the theory of protection. I think it is sustained by the logic of facts and justified by the history of this country. Being a protectionist, it seemed to me that, as a matter of course, this Congress would give adequate protection to the so-called "Turkish" tobacco which is raised in California. Applying the A, B, C principles of protection, that type of tobacco called for a special rate of duty if the duty was to afford adequate protection. I say that not, I hope, dogmatically, but I reassert it as a fact, that when the cost of production is compared with the cost of production in the foreign country—speaking broadly, Asia Minor—there is but one conclusion to be reached, and that is that a duty of at least $1 a pound, the amount fixed by the House, is necessary to afford adequate protection to the American producer; and with respect to those for whom I have unfeigned respect, I have never been able to understand why the action of the House in respect to this item was not approved by our Senate committee.

I voted in favor of the rate asked for Connecticut tobacco. I shall vote for a rate asked for any kind of tobacco if it be stated and if it be established that that rate is essential to afford adequate protection. I care not whether the tobacco is raised in Connecticut or California, in Wisconsin or in Kentucky, in Virginia or North Carolina, I am an American, and I propose to uphold any industry in any of the 48 States of this Union if a levying of duties is essential to the encouragement of that industry.

As to Turkish tobacco, it so happens that it is raised exclusively in the State of California. In one sense it may be called an infant industry, comparatively new. It may be of some service to call attention to a few figures showing the growth of this Turkish tobacco industry.

For example, in 1906 there were but 500 pounds of this tobacco raised in that State. We have a very large Armenian population in California, men and women and their children who fled from the brutalities of Europe and Asia Minor to find refuge, liberty, opportunity, happiness in America; and these Armenians, familiar with the cultivation of this tobacco, introduced it into California.

In 1906 there were 500 pounds raised; in 1907, 9,500 pounds; in 1908, 30,000 pounds; in 1909, 37,000 pounds; in 1910, 300,000 pounds; in 1911, 490,000 pounds; in 1912 it fell off a little, 250,000 pounds; in 1913, about the same number of pounds; in 1914, 245,000 pounds.

Then the Great War came on. Then trade, commerce, exchange were stopped. In 1915 the imports, speaking generally, being shut off largely, we increased the production in California to 500,000 pounds, and in 1916 to 800,000 pounds. In 1918 it was 870,000 pounds, and in 1919 it was 1,525,000 pounds. In 1920 it fell off somewhat, due to various causes and the renewed importations from abroad, but in 1920 there were 700,000 pounds produced in this country.

The House bill provided a rate of duty of $1 per pound. The facts seemed to and, I claim, did justify that rate when comparing the cost of production in California with the cost of production abroad.

Mr. President, the term "Turkish tobacco" is a generic term, and is used to differentiate between certain members of the tobacco family. Within that term, "Turkish tobacco," there are included over 20 varieties of tobacco. The term has no geographic significance any more than the term "navy bean," and no country can claim it as its product exclusively. By that I mean it is raised in Bulgaria, in Greece, in Rumania, in some parts of Russia, in Asia Minor, in Macedonia, some in South Africa, and, indeed, some in China; but in the trade it is spoken of as Turkish tobacco, a type essentially different from any other type of tobacco.

As to the other types of tobacco, certain rates have been fixed dependent upon cost of production. Applying the same principle to this item, it has been demonstrated that $1 a pound is necessary to equalize the cost in California and the cost in any other of the countries I have named.

If we apply the doctrine of protection, if we have not become ashamed or afraid of our own doctrine, if we have not been driven away from the fundamental principles of protection, then I submit to Members of my own side of the Chamber that a specific duty of $1 a pound is essential as to this particular American product.

I have a vast amount of facts and figures which I could call to the attention of the Senate. I could consume hours in elaborating upon this proposition. I do not think it necessary to do so, and therefore I refrain from doing so. Perhaps it will be helpful, however, to add a few words.

I remind members of the Finance Committee of this, that the tariff bill before us, as it came from the House, has given for the first time a separate classification for Turkish tobacco, and that for the very simple reason that this is a new industry, or the growing of a new and separate type of tobacco.

In all previous tariff acts each then existing type of tobacco was considered, as it has been here, and a supposedly adequate tariff duty fixed; I mean that a supposedly adequate tariff duty was fixed when the bills were framed by upstanding protective tariff Republicans. The suicidal Democratic theory, which has never failed to wreck this country, of course looks upon any protective rate as excessive; but tariff bills heretofore framed when great protective tariff Republicans assisted in the framing granted what I assume to be adequate duties upon the several different types of tobacco, depending upon the facts applicable. But here is a new type, the Turkish type of tobacco, raised in the one State, but which can be raised in vast quantities, and all it needs is an application of that protection which we have preached now for so many years.

The tariff of 35 cents per pound on filler tobacco antedates the introduction of cigarettes, the importation of the leaf, and the production in the United States. Turkish tobacco is used, as we know, for blending purposes in the manufacture of cigarettes, and we have come to smoke millions, I suppose billions, of cigarettes.

This rate of 35 cents on filler tobacco was imposed when the only forms of smoking were the pipe and cigar, and hence the term "filler tobacco," to fill the pipe or to fill the cigar, inclosed by a "wrapper." A duty of 35 cents was levied for revenue and for the protection of tobacco grown in Kentucky, Virginia, and other Southern States.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think that duty on filler tobacco was imposed to protect the growers of tobacco in Virginia and other Southern States, because that is not used for cigars. It was to protect, rather, tobacco grown in Iowa, Wisconsin, and some of those States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should have said Northern States, but since the introduction of the Turkish-type tobacco in California, in 1906, the growers have had to market their product under a tariff, the rate being 35 cents, which was not intended for that industry at all and was wholly inadequate to meet its needs.

I pause here to observe that the great growth of this industry in California may be attributed to the war period, when there was a practical embargo on the importation, which but shows, if it shows anything, that given an opportunity, given a chance, this industry will become vastly important to this country, as other industries will become vastly important.

There can be an embargo de facto caused by war and an embargo de jure—that is to say, caused or brought about by law; but whether by the one or the other cause, given an opportunity, American labor, American brains, and American genius will develop industries, and all I have contended for is that as to this industry a rate be fixed which will enable the producers in California to compete upon somewhat equal terms with the foreign producers yonder in Bulgaria, Rumania, Asia Minor, Turkey, and the other countries named.

But I have said enough. I repeat, however, that according to the facts and the figures submitted, a duty of at least $1 a pound on this type of tobacco is necessary. Practically every chamber of commerce of every city in California, practically every association of farmers or producers, practically every merchant familiar with the facts, so states. The hearing before the committee is a matter of record, and I submit justifies my statement and contention.

Who opposes the rate we ask? The cigarette smokers? The consumers? Not so. We know who opposes this rate.

The opposition came and comes from the cigarette manufacturers in America, the great corporations, the great associations, the great companies engaged in the manufacture of cigarettes. There is no use to disguise it. Of course, I am far from imputing any evil motive to gentlemen of the Senate when I suggest these companies as opposing the rate which we ask; but it is proper to say that the only ones who have opposed this rate of $1 were and are the cigarette manufacturers in the cities of the East. I venture to state that the showing proves this, that this suggested rate of $1 a pound would not add anything whatever to the cost of cigarettes to the consumers of this country, and if it be that this added rate would cost the cigarette manufacturers a little more, if that were conceded, it would not add one-tenth or one one-hundredth of a mill to the cost of cigarettes to the consumer.

I oppose this amendment on the grounds stated, that the 35 cents is entirely inadequate to afford protection to American producers of Turkish tobacco. I favor the rate as fixed by the House, namely, $1 per pound, upon the ground that that rate is absolutely essential to afford adequate protection to the growers of Turkish tobacco.

Somewhat more than that was asked, but those for whom I immediately speak had to be content, and in a sense are content, with the rate fixed by the House, and had hoped that our Senate committee would consider it its duty to stand by that rate; but they not doing so, I have expressed my views and the views of those whom I represent, reserving the right hereafter, however, to make a more adequate presentation of the matter. Indeed, I was not aware that this item in the bill would be reached this afternoon, and when I rose I did not intend to consume as much time as I have taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 97, line 21, to strike out the words "filler tobacco of the kind known as Turkish, $1 per pound."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a moment in reply to the Senator from California; in fact, I will not call it a reply, but rather an explanation.

First, I think the Senator and I stand in about the same position on the tobacco question. I think I ought to have at least a dollar more per pound on the wrapper; but I could not get it.

I will say to the Senator that I do not think there is any analogy between his desire to secure a dollar a pound on this filler tobacco and the desire of the wrapper people to raise their duty 25 cents a pound. A dollar a pound added to the filler tobacco would be an enormous increase, and I will say to the Senator that the condition of this industry in California was such that the committee did not feel justified in recommending the duty which he desires.

The testimony taken before the committee with regard to this matter shows that the California industry is very small, practically at a standstill, and that the rate which the Senator asks would add enormously to the cost of the imported filler; that is, outside of the question whether the California product is at all comparable to the imported product. It was stated, as the Senator knows, by the men who used this tobacco in the manufacture of cigarettes, that there was no similarity in quality. To be sure, it is called "Turkish" tobacco, but they said it was Turkish tobacco in name only.

The testimony taken before the committee shows that in 1921 there were something like 300 men engaged in raising the California product, and that the maximum production of the tobacco in the peak year was 1,500,000 pounds. The domestic tobacco used only in cigarettes amounts to about 150,000,000 pounds, and the imported tobacco used annually amounts to 40,000,000 pounds. So the additional duty sought to be imposed, at the rate of a dollar a pound, would raise $26,000,000. In other words, according to the statement of Mr. Aram, for instance, who was the witness who appeared before the committee, in a possible industry, with a possible income of $375,000 a year, he seeks to further tax the cigarette industry to the extent of $26,000,000 a year.

The committee had to take these facts into consideration, and while I think I am as good a protectionist as the Senator from California and have consistently voted to recommend adequate rates on California products, it seemed to the committee that the rate of $1 a pound on this tobacco was not warranted.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Connecticut is, of course, familiar with his subject. I suppose it will be admitted that this is a peculiar type or a type different from other types of tobacco; also that the cost of growing it and maturing it is different and greater than the cost of growing certain other types of tobacco. I suppose it will be admitted that the yield per acre is far less. Thus I suppose the average yield of what we might for the moment call southern tobacco is from 900 to 1,200, 1,400, or even 1,800 pounds per acre.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What would the Senator say would be the average?

Mr. SIMMONS. Six hundred or seven hundred pounds would be a high average.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of Turkish tobacco the average is 250 pounds.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not what the Agriculture Experiment Station of California says is the average. Mr. Edward C. Voorhis, in response to a wire about the average, said:

California tobacco acreage, 1919, was 700.

He puts the average at 700 pounds to the acre.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think that is an error. I have many letters from those engaged in growing who report their products in totals and as an average per acre.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read to the Senator, if he will permit me, two telegrams. On August 24 last we wired the College of Agriculture, Agriculture Experiment Station, California, as follows:

May we ask you to furnish us data, information, or statistics which you may have in regard to tobacco growing in your State?

Following is the reply:

California tobacco acreage, 1919, was 700 acres.

I had that wrong a moment ago.

Quantity harvested, 489 to 941 pounds. Value, $2.84 to $1.66.

The 700 that I read first was the acreage. The quantity harvested was estimated at 489 to 941 pounds. The mean between those two would be 658.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not care very much about that element when I know and when the facts are that the average cost per pound of raising this type of tobacco is such that the industry can not continue in California unless it is protected by a certain tariff duty. Nor am I at all afraid of the word protection. I believe that the industry should be protected, as I believe that quicksilver should be protected, and as I believe that any industry in North Carolina should be protected. I am not thinking of partisanship when I say that, nor am I thinking of geography, North or South. I am only saying that from some reflection and from some, not much, but a little, familiarity with the history of my country.

I believe, I am firmly of the belief, that the Government can aid in the building up of industries which will result in benefits to the people directly interested and indirectly concerned. Therefore, I plant myself on that fundamental rock of protection. I have heard nothing here from party associates, nor have I heard anything from Senators on the other side of the Chamber, to weaken my statement that, conceding protection at all, $1 is the necessary rate. If the facts justify 75 cents or if the facts were such as to justify only 50 cents, I would submit to those facts. I repeat, and have done, that the showing as made by all who appeared before the committee was that they could not go forward and pay the cost of labor, the cost of cultivation, and so forth, without this rate as fixed. If other Senators think otherwise they will, of course, vote accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate, but I desire to present an editorial at this time. Of course, the time has been taken up to-day by Members on the other side of the Chamber, practically all of the time, I might say 99.99 per cent of it. We heard a very splendid speech this morning by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], another one by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], another one from the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], another one from the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] on tobacco, and the very eloquent speech just made by my good friend the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. So the filibustering to-day has been altogether on the other side of the Chamber, but I suppose to-morrow morning it will be in the papers that they have so many more signers for a cloture rule to put the tariff through.

I merely desire to have incorporated in the RECORD, because I do not want to take up the time of the Senate by having it read, a very splendid editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 22, entitled "A bonus for profiteers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A BONUS FOR PROFITEERS.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Thursday evening, June 22, 1922.]

The Senate has voted to take up the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill and will attempt to pass it before the soldiers' bonus is again considered. The mortgaging of the Treasury to win the soldier vote is very important to the Senate majority, but the taxation of the necessaries of life of the American people to fill to overflowing the coffers of already profit-swollen monopolies is even more important.

Facts brought out by the investigation of Elliott Thurston, Washington correspondent of the Post-Dispatch and New York World, inspire wonder at the audacity of the contemplated betrayal of the American people by their elected agents at Washington.

The proposed duty on woolen goods will tax American consumers a possible $310,000,000 a year. The lobbyist of the National Knitted Outerwear Association admitted before the Senate committee that the sales of this branch of the industry had increased in 20 years from $8,000,000 to $287,000,000 and had paid 100 per cent in stock dividends as well as 7 per cent annual cash. Though prices shot up 150 per cent from 1914 to 1919, labor in the former year had a 19 per cent share in the income, but in the latter year only 15 per cent. Superlobbyist for three national associations of wool manufacturers—Col. John P. Wood, of Boston.

The cotton-goods schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill authorize a raid on the consumer's pocketbook of $750,000,000 a year. They would make possible a 100 per cent increase in the price of cotton handkerchiefs and hose. Superlobbyist—former Senator Henry F. Lippitt, of Rhode Island, manager and director of an enormously prosperous manufacturing business and carefully guards secret of earnings.

Under the silk schedule $274,000,000 could be extorted from the American people over present prices. Women would have to pay 50 per cent more for silk hose, according to experts' estimates, or accept an adulterated article. The industry at present earns 25 per cent on capitalization as increased on swollen war profits. Superlobbyists—Horace B. Cheney, of Manchester, Conn., and Frederick E. Kip, of Montclair, N. J., large manufacturers and spokesmen of the Silk Association of America.

Possible tribute from housewives and automobile buyers under the aluminum schedule would be $50,000,000 a year. The Aluminum Co. of America, a monopoly, increased its capital from $30,000,000 in 1913 to $110,000,000 in 1921. Net earnings, after deducting depreciation, taxes, and other expenses, averaged in excess of $10,000,000 a year. A recent letter to a retailer from the Aluminum Products Co., of La Grange, Ill., said: "Prices will advance approximately 20 per cent on the passage of the bill." Superlobbyist and president of the company—Arthur V. Davis. Original backer of the aluminum company, receiver of profits, and member of heavily interested family—Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon.

The glove industry thinks it will be satisfied with a schedule which opponents say will permit prices to be raised on $1.25 gloves to $2.50 and which will bar from our ports the most popular women's gloves now on the market. These gloves are dyed by a brushing-in process that American manufacturers can not imitate. Domestic gloves are dipped and the color soaks through the leather. In 1919 the glove makers reaped a profit of 20 per cent on invested capital. Superlobbyist—Ex-Representative Lucius N. Littauer, a political boss, convicted smuggler and involved in the glove scandal of the Spanish-American War.

The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, calculated to mulct the American public annually of a sum estimated to be equal to the annual revenue of the Government, is the measure dearest to the senatorial heart. It gets first preference on the Senate's program and will pass unless American public opinion rises en masse and blocks it. The service men have wanted a bonus out of the ill-gotten gains of war profiteers. They will not get it from this source. Their bonus will be extracted from the earnings of the people. Instead of taxing the war profiteers to help the soldiers the Senate plans to vote a bonus to the profiteers themselves. This bonus will ultimately extort from the service men whatever they will have been given by the Government.

The claim that the tariff will help labor is the merest humbug. Investigation has shown that labor gets a smaller proportion of profits from protected interests when dividends are large than when they are reasonable.

The Senate's pet measure to raise a prohibitive tariff wall against imports is a bonus from the pockets of the American people to America's biggest profiteers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words with reference to the duty proposed by the committee of 50 per cent on Turkish tobacco, because that is what it would be on a percentage basis. That is the rate the Committee on Finance has proposed. The Senator from California, however, desires to increase that rate by doubling it for the purpose of further protecting, as he claims, a certain type of tobacco grown in the State of California, which he calls Turkish tobacco. There are many varieties of Turkish tobacco. In California they are using a Turkish tobacco seed, and they think they have raised Turkish tobacco. They have been raising it there now for quite a number of years. I do not know how long, but 10 or 12 years, I think. They have not succeeded in raising it in any very large quantity up to the present time. The peak year, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] indicated, according to the testimony of Mr. Aram, who presented the California case, was given at 1,500,000 pounds. That is about three times the amount that seems to have been given in certain official reports which I have examined but have not at hand. Mr. Aram has made two statements about the matter, one before the House committee and one before the Senate committee. The peak year in his statement before the House committee was 1919, when he gave an estimate of 1,000,000 pounds. Before the Senate Committee on Finance he raised it to 1,500,000 pounds.

In 1921 there were only 48,000 pounds raised. The industry has been in existence in California since 1906. I do not know what grade of tobacco they are raising, but I do know that a report made by the Tobacco Merchants' Association of the United States, in a brief which they filed with the committee, made the statement that the tobacco, which they raised from Sumatra seed, does not take the place of Sumatra tobacco, and that, notwithstanding the vigorous efforts to reduce it as a blend tobacco, it has not been successful, but some of the larger dealers or larger manufacturers who have attempted to use it as a blend have found that it was not satisfactory and, in fact, abandoned it because the attempt to use it resulted in deterioration of their brands.

The average production of this tobacco, according to the agricultural experiment station, would seem to be somewhere between 700 and 800 pounds to the acre. It would amount in total figures to something around an average of from 700,000 to 800,000 pounds a year.

The amount of Turkish tobacco that is used in this country on an average is about 40,000,000 pounds. That blends with the American filler tobacco. Since the manufacturers began to use Turkish tobacco as a blend there has been a phenomenal increase in the consumption of cigarettes in this country. The consumption of tobacco in cigarettes has increased from approximately 38,000,000 pounds in 1911 to 198,000,000 pounds in 1919, an increase of 160,000,000 pounds.

There has been an impression among the tobacco growers as well as a fixed conviction among the tobacco manufacturers that the enormous increase in the use of cigarettes in this country, and throughout the world, as far as that is concerned—for we do export our cigarettes abroad to a considerable extent, for their popularity has grown with the years abroad as well as in this country—is due to a very large extent to the blending of our tobacco with the Turkish tobacco. Seventy-one per cent of all the cigarettes produced in this country to-day are blended with Turkish tobacco. A very small percentage of the pure Turkish cigarettes are manufactured in this country, the quantity being only about 7 per cent, and only about 23 per cent of the cigarettes are unblended.

When the Turkish cigarettes first began to be imported into this country the farmers in the tobacco-growing sections of the South—and especially was that true of North Carolina—were bitterly opposed to their coming in; they wanted a prohibitive duty imposed upon them, because, they said, those cigarettes would run their tobacco out, on account of the fact that they had a flavor which seemed to be popular which their tobacco did not possess; but the growers of tobacco in the South have become thoroughly convinced that blending their tobacco with the Turkish tobacco is a benefit instead of an injury; that it has enormously increased the demand for their product. They have, therefore, become reconciled to the importation of Turkish tobacco, and anything that would prevent its importation would be a very bad thing in its effect upon the tobacco industry of the South.

Mr. President, the highest average price which was received in this country for domestic tobacco during the World War was 41 cents a pound. In recent months the landed cost of Turkish tobacco imported into this country is 91 cents a pound. If the 50 cents duty proposed to be imposed by this bill is added to that, it will cost $1.41 a pound. That would be the price of Turkish tobacco in this country plus the duty. So that if the producers of the tobacco in California, if it is Turkish tobacco or approximately Turkish tobacco, can induce the manufacturers to use it, they would have to compete with a foreign tobacco which is sold in our markets for $1.41 a pound; and now it is proposed to increase the rate to $1 a pound.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in the light of the fact that the gentlemen who are engaged in growing this tobacco in California have not been able to induce the American manufacturers of cigarettes, whether the big dealers or the smaller dealers—for there are a few big dealers and a multitude of small dealers making cigarettes—to pay one-half the price—I think Mr. Aram complained that about 45 cents was the best price they could get—that they are willing to pay for the foreign product, is pretty good evidence that they have not yet been able to produce the desired type of so-called Turkish tobacco. If they ever become able to do that, Mr. President, under this bill, should it be passed, they will have 50 per cent protection against the foreign article, which now sells in our market, before the duty is added, at 91 cents a pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, out of abundance of caution, I reserve the right to have another vote on this question when the bill reaches the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment of the Commtitee on Finance was, on page 97, line 23, before the word "cents," where it occurs the first time, to strike out the figures "45" and to insert "35."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 97, in line 23, after the word "cents," to strike out the numeral "60" and insert the numeral "50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 97, at the end of line 23, to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That filler tobacco, not specifically provided for, commonly used without removing the stem shall be subject to the same duty as stemmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before that amendment is passed upon I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what would be the effect of the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Simply to allow the rate to remain at 35 cents a pound instead of 50 cents a pound, as it would be if the language were not stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 98, line 19, before the word "not," to strike out "including scrap tobacco"; and in line 20, after the words "cents per," to strike out "pound" and to insert "pound; scrap tobacco, 35 cents per pound," so as to make the paragraph read:

PAR. 603. All other tobacco, manufactured or unmanufactured, not specially provided for, 55 cents per pound; scrap tobacco, 35 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is in the agricultural schedule, on page 99——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time that when the Senate concludes its business on this calendar day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think we can conveniently take up the agricultural schedule this afternoon. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] informs me that he has a bill ready which he should like to have disposed of this evening. It is one which I understand is necessary to be passed before the 1st day of July.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator state whether or not the agricultural schedule will be proceeded with in the morning?

Mr. McCUMBER. We expect to take up and consider the agricultural schedule in the morning.

COMPENSATION OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to report with amendments from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. It is in the nature of an appropriation bill and simply provides for the extra compensation or bonus, so called, for civilian employees of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that he may out of order present a report from the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a moment. Is this the bill relating to the employees of the departments in Washington and employees generally of the Government?

Mr. WARREN. It relates to Government employees generally for whom provision has heretofore been made in the way of additional compensation as a bonus.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator refers to the $240 bonus?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside and the report will be received.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will say to the chairman of the committee that I am very much in favor of this bill, because I believe that, as conditions now are, we ought to continue the bonus for another year in view of the fact that the classification bill has not yet been passed; but this morning I received a letter from some one employed in the Veterans' Bureau stating that the bill does not provide for certain of the employees of that bureau, and that no reason was given for this discrimination. The statement was further made that many of the clerks of that bureau who are denied the bonus are doing identically the same work as other clerks getting the same pay and the bonus in addition. I make this statement preliminary to asking the question whether or not that is correct.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is not correct exactly as the Senator has stated it. Originally what was called the War Risk Insurance Bureau was provided for by a lump-sum appropriation, out of which salaries were paid. That was also true of the Federal Vocational Board and some other boards, and when the bonus was first granted some years ago it was not allowed in the case of any of the employees of those lump-sum bureaus and boards. Finally a compromise was reached whereby the regular salaries in some of those organizations were lowered so that they might come in with those to which a bonus would be added. The men and women thus employed are still working under that arrangement. Those taken over from the War Risk Bureau by the Veterans' Bureau get the bonus.

The employees of the Public Health Service have been taken over, and they are to receive the bonus. In the Federal Board for Vocational Education salaries were so arranged that the employees were not receiving the bonus, but were actually receiving altogether as large salaries as other employees who received the bonus. Now, these have been taken over, but they do not receive the bonus. Then there is a large number of new clerks who have been employed by the Veteran's Bureau and paid out of a lump sum. If they are not receiving a sufficient compensation, the fault is with the Veteran's Bureau. If we should undertake to pay all of those new employees a bonus in addition to the salary they receive, it would have to come out of the sum appropriated for the maintenance of the bureau, and the bureau would have to employ accordingly a lesser number of clerks, and certain of them would receive more. It would, however, prefer a class and give a bonus to a certain line of employees when employees in other lines would not receive it; in other words, if we desire to be exactly just, we will leave the provision as it came from the House.

I am aware of a letter which the Senator from Ohio says he has received. Similar letters have been scattered very generally among Senators. But in discussing the matter with the representative of that institution before the committee it came down to just this: They think it would be more convenient for them if we would let them put in these bonuses, and then, to prevent two employees sitting side by side and doing the same kind of work receiving different salaries, they could reduce and adjust and thereby bring about an equality.

The committee does not see the matter in that light. We do not think it is necessary to enlarge the payment of certain men so that they and others can be reduced accordingly. If we leave it as it is they will be receiving what all other employees of the Government, so far as we know, are receiving. There are very many employees who do not receive bonuses because their salaries are fixed otherwise, and are fixed higher than or as high as the old-established salaries plus the bonus. The Veterans' Bureau had representatives before the House committee, several pages of testimony were taken, and we have the record here printed before us. All of this the Senate committee has studied. We agree with the House, and we have not changed their figures in this respect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I remember that when some bill was up here a short time ago fixing the pay—I think, perhaps, it was in the navy yards—it was contended on the one side that these men were not getting the bonus. On the other side it was contended that when the pay was fixed originally by the department the increased cost of living was taken into consideration, and that the basic salary was fixed so as to include the bonus. I am simply appealing now for equality of treatment among these people.

Mr. WARREN. And if we should do what is asked in that letter we would do an injustice.

As to the matter of the Navy, certain employees referred to in this bill and in every other relating to the subject have their salaries or pay fixed by a salary or wage board. There is a wage board that arranges every three months or six months, as the case may be, the payment of these mechanics, and so forth.

At one time during the war, when everybody was exceedingly anxious to do justice and more, and the matter was not understood in the Senate, perhaps, they voted a bonus for these wage-earners on top of the full pay, and the men received it for a certain number of months; but when it was understood it came up again, and although the provision was put in on the Senate side by suspending the rules—there was a sufficient vote at the time to suspend the rules, and it was put on and sent back to the House—of course it had to go off again. Now the wage boards understand fully that we have not paid and do not propose to pay a bonus to those men who are receiving a per diem, and whose pay is arranged by these wage boards according to the cost of living and according to what the same class of employees get in private employment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with the committee's assurance that in fixing the wages they have taken into consideration the fact that the bonus was to be paid, and have included that in the basic pay, if that be true I am content with it.

Mr. WARREN. That is so in many lines.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that this was the policy: After the war started, and after the increase in salaries had taken place, some new agencies were established by law in the Government, such as the agency for the vocational training of the soldiers. They were paid from a lump sum. For instance, we will take messengers. The regular rate for messengers was $840 a year. With the bonus it was $240 more, or $1,080. They immediately started off at $1,080, giving them just exactly the same as the statutory rate plus the $240 bonus, so that they were on exactly the same basis; and that is what we are trying to keep them on now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether or not the employees of the Shipping Board, who have been a law to themselves and have drawn enormous salaries, come under this bill?

Mr. WARREN. They have nothing to do with the bonus.

Mr. KING. They do not come under this?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they have nothing to do with the bonus. It is only employees whose salaries are $2,500 or under that get the bonus.

Mr. WARREN. There are employees in very many lines that do not receive it that must be paid otherwise.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. When this matter was up before, there was a good deal of discussion about this bonus. Certain amendments were offered to the bill, a number of which were adopted. Is this carrying out practically the same scheme that was incorporated in the bill at that time?

Mr. WARREN. This is carrying out precisely what we have had for the last year, except the natural changes that may change the language a little in some places, like the one to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] alluded. Otherwise it is just the same.

Mr. HARRISON. That was my impression. This is merely a continuation of the present law because the reclassification report has not yet been adopted by the Congress?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BURSUM. The complaint which I received about this bill came from the Veterans' Bureau, and it was to the effect that there was an amendment in the bill which prevented an employee who might be transferred from another department to the Veterans' Bureau from receiving a bonus.

Mr. WARREN. No. It expressly states that those shall receive the bonus who received it during last year.

Mr. BURSUM. I have sent for the paper to which I refer, but that is the substance of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Every Senator got it. There was not a Senator that did not get it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head "Legislative," on page 5, line 7, after the word "Senate," to strike out "$184,440" and to insert "including 17 employees who are authorized to be paid from the contingent fund, $188,520."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 18, before the name "Panama," to insert "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, $894,000;".

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 5, after the words "Navy Department," to strike out "$444,720" and insert "$458,640"; in line 6, after the words "Naval Establishment," to strike out "$42,000" and insert "$78,480"; and in line 7, before the words "Department of State," to strike out "Post Office Department, $359,280," and to insert "Post Office Department, employees engaged in connection with the distribution, sale, and keeping of accounts of Treasury savings certificates, as provided in the deficiency appropriation act approved November 4, 1918, $12,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 10, to insert "Post Office Department, payable from the revenues of the Post Office Department, $352,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$36,287,012" and to insert "$37,241,012."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if, under the terms of this bill, the navy yard employees and those in the naval gun factories and stations are included in the $240 bonus?

Mr. WARREN. Those whose wages are arranged by wage boards are not included, and were not included last year.

Mr. CALDER. I recall last year that that was the case, and that as a result of the failure to provide for the navy yard employees the pay of these men was reduced about 20 cents an hour, on the average.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator heard what I said when I first responded to the Senator from Ohio he would note his mistake.

Mr. CALDER. I was not in the Chamber at the time.

Mr. WARREN. It was put on erroneously, and over the head and protest of the committee, at one time two years ago. It was added after the pay had been fixed by the wage board at a rate that was intended to be in full. For part of the year, erroneously, they did receive the bonus; but that was settled afterwards, and since then they have not received it. They received their full pay through their wage board committees.

Mr. CALDER. I know that up to July 1 of last year the bonus was paid to these men, and afterwards it was deducted from them, and then there was a readjustment of pay last fall.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. So that, as I understand, these men are now receiving about 20 cents an hour less than they received before July 1 last.

Mr. SMOOT. That was on account of the adjustment of the pay according to law. As the salaries outside have decreased, so have their salaries decreased. I will say to the Senator that it was not on account of the bonus at all.

Mr. CALDER. This bill, however, provides for these men the same as the bill of last year, and it really in effect reduced their pay.

Mr. WARREN. It has not reduced their pay at all in any manner because of leaving it out last year, because the wage board met at once or soon and arranged their pay accordingly. The pay of employees of the navy yard may have been reduced the same as that of the employees of other departments may have been reduced, to conform to the wages current in private employment in the same line, but they are receiving full pay, and with no expectation of receiving the bonus unless they can beat us out of it, as they did here once before, on misrepresentations or misunderstanding.

Mr. CALDER. I have no desire to misrepresent anything.

Mr. WARREN. No; I know the Senator has not.

Mr. CALDER. I am not going to ask for a roll call on this matter. I am going to offer an amendment to this bill to test this question, and I will ask for a rising vote. The amendment I offer is this:

On page 3, line 1, after the word "included," I move to strike out all down to and including the word "service" on line 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, in lines 1 to 4, both inclusive, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

> Employees whose pay is adjustable from time to time through wage boards or similar authority to accord with the commercial rates paid locally for the same class of service.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if that amendment is agreed to, it will then be necessary to provide additional funds to pay for a bonus for the men employed in the navy yards and gun factories. It will mean, all told, I imagine, about $4,000,000 additional; and it seems to me, in view of the wages these men are getting now, that it would be equitable.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken about reducing the pay. He has been misinformed about it, and I desire to say that this amendment should not be adopted. There is no use in putting it on here, at the behest of somebody, to seem more liberal. It never can go through, of course, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that those wages have been adjusted, and the bonus bill had nothing whatever to do with it. They were adjusted under existing law, which specifically states that they are not entitled to a $240 bonus.

Mr. WARREN. But I will cut the matter short by making the point of order. This is an appropriation bill. The amendment has not been introduced a day beforehand, it has not been sent down to the committee, and it increases the amount carried by the bill, so that it violates the rule in several respects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from New York to move to strike out a certain portion of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. But that means increasing the amount of money appropriated by the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not see, however, that a point of order would lie against the motion to strike out.

Mr. SMOOT. The part that the Senator from New York asks to strike out is the exception of certain employees; and if that goes out they will get the $240 bonus, and we will have to make an appropriation for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The provision is in the bill, and the Senator from New York can certainly make a motion to strike out any provision in the bill. It will be up to the Senate to say whether or not it will strike it out. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Chair will hear me until I finish what I was about to say. If a point of order is not good against this amendment, then it is not good against any amendment at any time that increases an amount over and above what is recommended by a standing committee, or any amendment that has not under the rule been sent to a committee, because the direct effect of it is to increase the amount of money to be paid to these people under this bill, and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] frankly states that his amendment will increase the amount, and that is his intention.

Mr. SMOOT. By $4,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I would like to call the Senator's attention to Rule I, about the middle of the rule, where it reads:

> And no amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That does not refer to a motion to strike out a provision in a bill.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator moving the amendment states that if his motion carries, it means an increase in the appropriation of $4,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not sustain the point of order on a motion to strike out a provision in a bill. The Chair may be wrong about it, but it seems to me that any Senator has a right to move to strike out any provision in a bill, whatever the effect may be upon it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I would like to ask for information, for I have just come into the Senate Chamber. What is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York? Does it relate to the employees in the War Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. CALDER. No; on page 3, line 1, after the word "included," to strike out all down to and including the word "service," on line 4. The effect of it is to give the bonus to men employed in the gun factories and the navy yards.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I stated. It might just as well read that the salaries of these men shall be increased by the addition of the bonus of $240.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is his intention to press the bill to a final vote to-night?

Mr. WARREN. That is what I had intended.

Mr. STERLING. I hope that will not be done. If it can go over, it will give us a little time to consider the bill. It has been put before us without any previous notice. It is a very important measure. I wanted to direct attention to another matter to which my attention was called a day or two ago in regard to this bill and the way it affects the employees of the War Veterans' Bureau. As I understand it, there is no reason on earth, if a bonus is given to particular employees of the Government, why it should not be given to the employees in that bureau.

Mr. WARREN. If there is a department for which a lump-sum appropriation is made, and the salary of one man is $1,800 or $2,000, and the salary of the man sitting at the next desk is $1,440 or $1,600, how are you going to correct that inequality if they do the same work? Would you give the $240 to each one, to the $2,000 man, as well as to the other?

Mr. STERLING. How do you apply it elsewhere in the Government service when those who get under $2,500 are entitled to the $240 bonus? It is the same thing, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. They were only entitled to it in cases where the offices were organized before a certain date, when the bonus provision came into effect. The employees in every subdivision of the Government that was organized after the war began, to which we paid a lump sum, received the $240 bonus in the salary they drew, and it was so understood.

Mr. STERLING. Exactly the same reasoning applies to these people who have not as yet received their bonus as applies to the others.

Mr. SMOOT. But they have received their bonus in their compensation. If they got $1,400, they would get $1,640, and if they got $1,800, they would get $2,040.

Mr. STERLING. It is not my understanding that these people receive the bonus in the compensation they are now getting. On the contrary, they receive no bonus and nothing equivalent to the bonus.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that during the war we created a number of what might be denominated independent executive agencies, among them the War Risk Bureau, the Shipping Board, and many others not necessary to enumerate, and we appropriated lump sums for them. Immediately those in charge gave the employees much larger salaries than other Government employees received, and my information is that those employees, doing the same grade of work performed by those in statutory positions in the Government, received very much higher salaries. The contention of the Senator from Wyoming, as I understand it, is that if the Senator's position be correct we would be giving to those employees who happened to come into these governmental executive agencies during the war higher salaries than we are paying to other employees who have been in the Government service for many years.

Mr. STERLING. I can not agree with the contention of the Senator from Wyoming in that respect, nor with that of the senior Senator from Utah.

Mr. WARREN. Let me read from the testimony of Mr. Routsong before the committee:

> The CHAIRMAN. When you made your estimate for the 1923 appropriation, did you not make those estimates based upon the idea that those employees would be paid on the present basis of pay without the bonus? I am referring to the rehabilitation division employees.
> Mr. ROUTSONG. Yes, sir; we figured on the basic pay that they were receiving at the time we made the estimate.

Mr. STERLING. That is for what service?

Mr. WARREN. That refers to the men of whom the Senator spoke, those in the Veterans' Bureau. Some employees there are asking that they be given the bonus.

Mr. SMOOT. This refers to the rehabilitation division employees, changed to the War Veterans' Bureau from the vocational training service, where they were paid salaries which included the $240 bonus, because of the fact that those positions were created by act of Congress. It was specifically provided in the bonus law that it should not apply to them. Therefore they were out of the lump sum paid the regular salaries given to other people doing similar work, with the $240 bonus added, just as was the case in the Children's Bureau.

In the Children's Bureau a messenger was paid $1,080. Messengers in all the other bureaus are paid $840, with the $240 bonus, making $1,080.

Mr. STERLING. That is not the understanding I have had from a representative from the bureau—I think the head of a division—who came to see me last Saturday in regard to this matter. Otherwise I would not be here raising the question.

Mr. WARREN. We gave an opportunity to those gentlemen to come before the committee, and the subcommittee has given the matter full attention. If we should undertake to cover every complaint made in various cases by the heads of divisions, we would be paying out several hundred thousand dollars, yes, millions, that we are not paying at this time. This bonus is only to make up the deficiencies to a small number, comparatively, of the employees of the Government. Of course, if we open the door to all who ask, we will do an injustice, where we are trying to do justice.

Mr. STERLING. Of course, the whole matter of the bonus might have been settled definitely before this time if another bill had had reasonably, just reasonably, prompt consideration. I refer to the reclassification bill, which would have covered the bonus.

Mr. SMOOT. And more than covered it.

Mr. WARREN. I think that is probably true. I hardly think the Senator would care to place the fault at anybody's door, however.

Mr. STERLING. I am not just now placing the fault at anybody's door, but there is a fault somewhere. I wonder if the Senator would not be willing that this bill should go over until to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. For what reason?

Mr. STERLING. For the purpose of allowing us a little further time for a study and consideration of it, and a chance to inquire with regard to the Veterans' Bureau in the matter I suggested a little while ago.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the testimony of a gentleman from the Veterans' Bureau was taken, and it is here. It was read before the Senator came in. He was heard this morning before the committee—not before the full committee, but before the subcommittee.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know to what the Senator refers. I did not know of a meeting of the committee at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read further from the testimony from which the Senator from Wyoming has already read, if the Senator from South Dakota will give me his attention:

> The CHAIRMAN. * * * I am referring to the rehabilitation division employees.
> Mr. ROUTSONG. Yes, sir; we figured on the basic pay that they were receiving at the time we made the estimate.
> The CHAIRMAN. So that they would not be entitled to the bonus under that estimate, or under that appropriation, and if we paid them the bonus now, we would be giving them $240, or whatever the amount should happen to be, in excess of what they are being paid, and you would have that much more money than you would be entitled to?
> Mr. ROUTSONG. I believe that is true.

Mr. STERLING. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Routsong's.

Mr. STERLING. Who is he?

Mr. WARREN. He was sent here by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to represent that particular bureau.

Mr. STERLING. I think it but fair to all concerned and interested in this important piece of legislation that the bill should go over until to-morrow. There will be ample time to consider it and have it enacted into law before the 1st of July.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does not the Senator understand that the House is about to take a recess. I understand the bill puts everybody in status quo, so that the employees will get the salaries they are receiving now. By the bill we do not increase anybody's salary, and we do not make any new salaries. We just put them back exactly where they are to-day. Why not let the bill pass?

Mr. STERLING. Because of the considerations I have already mentioned I am not willing that it should pass to-night.

Mr. OVERMAN. I never believed the Senator could get the reclassification bill through before the 1st of July.

Mr. STERLING. I know. There are a few Senators who have not so believed——

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think he could get it through.

Mr. STERLING. And if any considerable number believe that way, or fail to believe it will get through, it will not. If Senators believed or failed to believe that this or that thing would be done, it would be accomplished or not accomplished, according to the faith they had in regard to it and according to their disposition to assist in getting through legislation, instead of throwing obstacles in the way of legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know of any obstacles which have been thrown in the way of that bill.

Mr. STERLING. I am not saying that the Senator from North Carolina has thrown any obstacles in its way for a moment, and I do not want him to understand so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. STERLING. I think I have said all I want to submit. That is my request, that the bill may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator must admit that I have always been exceedingly kind to him if complying with requests indicates kindness, but at the present time the circumstances are somewhat different from the ordinary case. I am on the floor now by unanimous consent of this body and by the consent of the Senator who has charge of a very important bill. I do not feel that I can surrender the floor at this time upon the request of a Senator unless, indeed, it may be on the request or permission of the Senator in charge of the tariff bill.

Mr. STERLING. I want to say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, that while the House is going to take a recess, I understand it will not be before the 1st of July, anyhow, if then. This is only Monday, and there will be ample time to consider this bill. I shall not do anything to delay its passage after I have had time to look into this question a little further.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must remember that there are other appropriation bills which it is very necessary to get through, and we can not wait by the way very long. As I said, I am under the embarrassment of having the floor by the consent of another committee and the Senate. If the Senate considers that it is a reasonable request and wants to grant the time, it can do so, but I do not think it is necessary in connection with this bill to have to thrash out differences of opinion about the reclassification bill. I do not think that has anything to do with this particular bill.

Mr. STERLING. Nor have I asked that differences of opinion be thrashed out here; but that measure is in a way related to this bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator introduced the subject.

Mr. STERLING. It is in a way related to the reclassification bill. My expectation was at one time, my great hope was, that the reclassification bill would be reported out; that the Senate would consider it and act upon it before the 1st day of July and settle this question of the bonus. I think every Senator who is a member of the Appropriations Committee knows that I had that hope and expectation at one time. It could have been disposed of in that way, and there was no necessity to pass another bonus bill. We all realize how vicious the bonus system is. Of course there is merit in the bonus under the circumstances in that it gives the employees of the Government adequate compensation, which they were not receiving. That is the excuse for it, but we ought to provide for it and could have provided for it in some other way than by another bonus bill this year.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the Senator from South Dakota desires in this bill to increase the salaries employees are getting to-day?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Utah——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator desire to increase the salaries of any employees?

Mr. STERLING. As I previously stated, I want to consider this matter of the Veterans' Bureau employees with reference to the situation and to ascertain certainly and beyond doubt that they are compensated in the salaries they are now getting, and that their present salaries are now equivalent to the original basic pay of other employees with the bonus added.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply asked the Senator whether he wanted in this bill to increase the salaries of some employees of the Government.

Mr. STERLING. No; not for a moment. I want to see that the salaries are at least equitable as between the employees in the various offices.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this bill does not increase the salary of any employee of the Government. It places all the employees of the Government in the same identical position they are in to-day.

Mr. STERLING. I can ascertain that fact to my satisfaction before the convening of the Senate to-morrow, and if I do so ascertain it I shall make no objection upon that score.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DETAIL FROM FIELD FORCE OF CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask that the tariff bill may be further temporarily laid aside to consider House Joint Resolution 344.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs. In other words, it is a joint resolution to continue the present law.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923, for and in connection with the enforcement of the laws relating to customs, not to exceed at any one time four persons detailed from the field force of the Customs Service.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 27, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 26, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

This is the day the Lord hath made, blessed be Thy holy name. Though full of imperfection, we wait for the disclosure of Thy presence. We offer Thee our love and gratitude and do Thou receive them. Continue to unfold our knowledge of justice, of equity, of the rights of men, and of the necessities of the State. Always lead us to give opportunity to our best thoughts and our wisest plans. O keep us from confusing moral principles and hold before us the clear vision of integrity. Dear Lord, bring to all of us those hidden comforts so rich and tender, which human hearts need day by day. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, June 24, 1922, and Sunday, June 25, 1922, were read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 337. Joint resolution granting consent of Congress and authority to the Port of New York Authority to execute the comprehensive plan approved by the States of New York and New Jersey, by chapter 43, Laws of New York, 1922, and chapter 9, Laws of New Jersey, 1922.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 171. Joint resolution granting consent of Congress and authority to the Port of New York Authority to execute the comprehensive plan approved by the States of New York and New Jersey, by chapter 43, Laws of New York, 1922, and chapter 9, Laws of New Jersey, 1922; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Concurrent Resolution 61, in respect to the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I assume that is done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. No; it is a priviledged matter.

Mr. FOCHT. I understand it is privileged to call it up, but is it privileged to call it up on District day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken about that. This is a report from the Committee on Printing, business of the House which is always privileged.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was notified to bring in absentees.

TRADING IN GRAIN FUTURES.

Mr. FOCHT and Mr. TINCHER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain, by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges, and for other purposes, in order under a rule heretofore adopted.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, it is well understood that this is District day under the rules and I insist upon the order provided for by the rules. I wish to call up bills relating to the District of Columbia that are ready for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, of course, that this is District day, but by a special rule of the House the bill which the gentleman from Kansas has called up is also entitled to be considered. It is for the House to decide. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kansas first. If the House desires to take up District business, it can vote down the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania to call up District business.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to substitute a motion for the one made by the gentleman from Kansas, that District business be taken up.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion I made is not subject to amendment or to debate.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order, but the same result can be obtained by gentlemen who desire to take up District business voting against the motion of the gentleman from Kansas. If that be voted down, the Chair would then recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I should think that the motion might be put the other way, so that the question may be decided whether District day is to be continually and forever set aside. I would like to have the House decide that without taking into consideration the merits or the demerits of the bill which the gentleman from Kansas calls up.

The SPEAKER. The House has that opportunity now. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOCHT) there were—ayes 151.

Mr. FOCHT (during the division of the House). Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-three Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. Those who are opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas will rise. [After counting.] Fifty-eight Members in the negative. On this vote, the ayes are 151 and the noes 58.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that it discloses the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Oh, the Chair thinks there is a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Many more than a quorum are present. The Chair will not count any longer. The ayes have it, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will take the chair.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to ask the Chair what the status will be in respect to District business following the disposition of the Tincher bill?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. FOCHT. To-day.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11843, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11843, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges, and for other purposes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLER. There was such confusion in the House that when the request was made by the gentleman from Kansas nobody could hear it. I understand that his request was to dispense with the first reading of the bill, but nobody could hear the request, and it seems to me we ought to have a chance to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, of course, is too late.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. There is evidently a quorum present, and the point of order is not sustained.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be notified at the end of 10 minutes. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture to correct the grain futures act in its defects wherein it was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States on the 15th of May. We attempted to regulate the grain exchanges under the taxing power of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court decided that we could not do that. There were two decisions by the Supreme Court within two weeks, the first on the packers' act defining commerce, and then one on the grain futures act which made the duty of the Committee on Agriculture very clear if we want the regulation. We had the law and the law was functioning, and the department was operating under the law, and I want to say to this House that in no time in the history of our Government was there less manipulation of the grain market or less complaint of manipulation of the trading than during the time that this law was in force. No man ever heard a complaint. I simply want to call attention to that fact. The law was held unconstitutional on the 10th day of May. They were making reports under the old law by the exchanges, and it showed that from the 15th day until the 31st day of May the market was so manipulated that there was the greatest depression known in the history of our country in the price of wheat in this country and that from May up to the present time there has been a depression of about 40 cents a bushel in grain. Some people say there is depression in other things. Well, there have been in some other things, but during the time wheat went down 40 cents a bushel, cotton, which has a fair exchange, went up 5 cents a pound. And I say there is other evidence, call it a corner or what you may, showing there has been the greatest manipulation of the farmer's products during the time we did not have this law of any time in the history of the country. They were evidently ready for manipulation and pulled it off. Now, I never have said that this bill would prevent trading in futures. There is a legitimate trade in the sale of wheat for future delivery, and there is a legitimate trade in hedging, and the legitimate ends of the grain trade are not opposed to having the manipulation put out of the market. It is by an element in the trade as represented entirely by the plaintiff who brought the suit that tested the constitutionality of the law that are not fair and do not want the law of supply and demand to govern. But I am not going to take up time on this bill. This bill was debated for three days in the House before. But I do want to suggest this——

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. I have the highest respect for the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer and I would like, while he is discussing this bill, if he will, to define between the provisions of this law and the provisions of the first child labor law which the Supreme Court held unconstitutional. I know in the gentleman's mind there must be enough distinction to justify him in stating this law will be constitutional.

Mr. TINCHER. Absolutely. But in reference to a comparison between the two, the first child labor law did not apply to interstate commerce. We have defined interstate commerce, using the language of the Supreme Court, as applying to grains and this law will not apply to any transaction except interstate transactions as defined by the court. It does not cover any other transaction, and if some exchange in Chicago does not want to operate under this law and wants to say that they are a purely intrastate exchange, they will not come under it. We are not trying to regulate intrastate transactions, but we were simply trying to regulate interstate transactions. Now, the reason we do that and the reason the law will be effective is that practically all the business is interstate business, and no exchange will refuse to become a designated market place and comply with the law because all the business practically is interstate business. Now I want to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman will recall his argument of last year that trading in futures is essentially gambling. In fact, I think he will admit he used those two words interchangeably—trading in futures and gambling.

Mr. TINCHER. I never used them interchangeably.

Mr. ELLIS. I will take the trouble a little later to read you the argument and show that you did.

Mr. TINCHER. I yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ELLIS. What I want to know now is whether you take the position before the House that there is such a thing as legitimate trading in futures that does not work inevitable change in the markets?

Mr. TINCHER. I have never said that the sale of wheat for future delivery should be entirely wiped out or the sale of futures should be wiped out, but have always said, and I still say, that to let a few gamblers manipulate the grain market was not only unfair to the consumer but unfair to the legitimate trade. And there is only one class against this legislation, and that is the gambling class, and the producer and the consumer in the United States will be the beneficiary of this legislation.

Under leave, I desire to print a brief on the legality of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The future trading act (approved August 24, 1921, 42 Stat. 187) was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in Hill against Wallace upon the ground that it was not a tax but a regulatory measure, and was based wholly upon the taxing power without any suggestion of the commerce clause of the Constitution or the limitations which would be necessary if that clause were relied upon. The accompanying bill is based upon the commerce clause of the Constitution.

While the court has held in Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S. 405) that sales for future delivery as conducted on the exchanges are not in and of themselves interstate commerce, since they do not obligate interstate shipments, nevertheless the court has also held that when Congress finds that intrastate transactions are intimately related to and inseparably commingled with interstate commerce such conditions subject them to Federal regulation under the commerce clause of the Constitution. What is the relation between such transactions and interstate commerce in grain? It is a matter of common knowledge that the great bulk of the country's grain supply is neither produced nor consumed in the States in which the several boards of trade are located. On the contrary, it is grown and consumed in other States and merely passes through the terminal markets where the exchanges are located on its route from the farms in the grain-producing States to other States and foreign countries which either do not produce grain at all or do not produce it in sufficient quantities to supply their needs. Therefore, obviously the boards of trade merely provide facilities for the commercial movement of the grain on its interstate route from origin to ultimate destination and the members of properly conducted boards of trade furnish a service necessary for the orderly sale and movement of such grain in interstate commerce. Hence it is evident that what would otherwise appear to be strictly local transactions in grain are as a matter of fact so intimately related to and inseparably commingled with this continuous interstate movement of grain that they can not be separated from the interstate transactions to which they contribute, and, therefore, necessarily take on an interstate character. Hence the intimate connection of the boards of trade and their members with interstate commerce in grain is clear. They and their members occupy the same status with respect to the usual course of grain in interstate commerce that is occupied by the stockyards and commission men and dealers therein with respect to the natural course of live stock in interstate commerce from producer to consumer.

It will be remembered that in Hopkins v. United States (171 U. S. 578) and Anderson v. United States (171 U. S. 604) the Supreme Court held that the local business of buying and selling live stock for a commission was not interstate commerce, even though the live stock bought or sold was moving in interstate commerce. Nevertheless, the court held that under the conditions set forth in Stafford v. Wallace (Advance Sheets, 42 Sup. Ct. 397), upholding the packers and stockyards act of 1921, such business, on account of its close relationship to the great current of interstate commerce flowing through the stockyards, took on an interstate character. In that case the court said, page 402:

> The stockyards are not a place of rest or final destination. Thousands of head of live stock arrive daily by carload and trainload lots and must be promptly sold and disposed of and moved out, to give place to the constantly flowing traffic that presses behind. The stockyards are but a throat through which the current flows, and the transactions which occur therein are only incident to this current from the West to the East and from one State to another. Such transactions can not be separated from the movement to which they contribute and necessarily take on its character. The commission men are essential in making the sales, without which the flow of the current would be obstructed, and this whether they are made to packers or dealers. The dealers are essential to the sales to the stock farmers and feeders. The sales are not in this aspect merely local transactions. They create a local change of title, it is true, but they do not stop the flow; they merely change the private interests in the subject of the current, not interfering with, but, on the contrary, being indispensable to, its continuity. The origin of the live stock is in the West; its ultimate destination, known to and intended by all engaged in the business, is in the Middle West and East, either as meat products or stock for feeding and fattening. This is the definite and well-understood course of business. The stockyards and the sales are necessary factors in the middle of this current of commerce.

Transactions in futures on the boards of trade are resorted to primarily for two purposes, namely, by the public for mere speculation and by the grain trade for the purpose of eliminating or reducing, as far as practicable, the hazards in the purchase and sale of grain and its products and by-products due to price fluctuations. The country elevator man in Nebraska sells futures on the Chicago Board of Trade against purchases which he makes from the Nebraska farmers to protect him, as far as practicable, against losses on the grain so purchased, which he will ship in interstate commerce to Chicago. The miller in Ohio buys futures on the Chicago Board of Trade to protect him, as far as practicable, against losses on wheat which he must purchase later to fill contracts which he has made with the manufacturers of flour. Prices of futures are quoted generally and disseminated throughout the United States and foreign countries and are used extensively as a basis for determining the prices for the producer and consumer alike. The Nebraska elevator man is guided by them in buying the farmers' wheat. The Ohio miller, when making sales of flour for future delivery without having on hand at the time the wheat, resorts to these quotations in order to determine the price at which he can safely sell such flour.

In New York and Chicago Grain and Stock Exchange v. Chicago Board of Trade (127 Ill. 153, 2 L. R. A. 411) the Supreme Court of Illinois, speaking of the Chicago Board of Trade, said:

> It has been said, and with much show of reason, that the floors of this exchange hall stand in the gateway of commerce. * * * Four-fifths of the grain and provisions produced in the States and Territories of the Northwest are bought and sold in this market, and the business there done is so vast in its proportions that it fixes the market prices of grains, breadstuffs, and meats for the extensive territory that is tributary to Chicago, and seriously affects, and to a considerable extent controls, the values of the necessaries of life throughout the United States and the civilized world. * * * For many years the board has so used its franchises, and its members have so conducted their business, as that it has become a vast commercial influence and fixes the market values of grain and agricultural products for a large territory, and the fluctuations in prices upon its floors powerfully affect the market prices of the necessaries of life throughout the country and the world. The great power and influence which the board possesses in dictating market values is owing to the vast aggregation of products which are drawn to its portals for a market and are bought and sold upon its floors, and which pay tribute and toll in the shape of commissions to its members.

The foregoing facts and illustrations show very clearly the far-reaching effect which future transactions in grain do and may exert upon the price of the great current of grain which moves in interstate commerce. They may, therefore, be properly treated as great national public utilities, as the stockyards and their facilities were in the packers and stockyards act of 1921. (Stafford against Wallace.)

Transactions in futures on the boards of trade are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control. Sudden and unreasonable fluctuations frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control which, although profitable to the manipulator, are detrimental to the producer and consumer and the persons who handle grain and its products and by-products in interstate commerce. These fluctuations make the business of dealing in grain and its products and by-products in interstate commerce hazardous from time to time. Consequently such manipulated fluctuations frequently do and always are capable of constituting an obstruction to or burden upon interstate commerce in grain. Therefore their regulation is necessary for the protection of such commerce.

That sales for future delivery may affect interstate commerce and are subject to Federal control when they do is settled by United States v. Patten (226 U. S. 525), in which the Supreme Court sustained an indictment charging the defendants with having conspired to restrain interstate commerce in cotton by cornering the whole cotton market of the country by excessive purchases of cotton for future delivery. If Congress, under the antitrust law, can constitutionally provide for punishing or restraining a conspiracy against interstate commerce after it has been formed, it certainly can provide against its formation. It was so held by the Supreme Court in the Stafford case (Advance sheets, 42 Sup. Ct. 397, 403).

> If Congress could provide for punishment or restraint of such conspiracies after their formation through the antitrust law, as in the Swift case, certainly it may provide regulation to prevent their formation. The reasonable fear by Congress that such acts, usually lawful and affecting only intrastate commerce when considered alone, will probably and more or less constantly be used in conspiracies against interstate commerce or constitute a direct and undue burden on it, expressed in this remedial legislation, serves the same purpose as the intent charged in the Swift indictment to bring acts of a similar character into the current of interstate commerce for Federal restraint.

In the Patten case the court also said:

> Section 1 of the act, upon which the counts are founded, is not confined to voluntary restraints, as where persons engaged in interstate trade or commerce agree to suppress competition among themselves, but includes as well involuntary restraints, as where persons not so engaged conspire to compel action by others or to create artificial conditions which necessarily impede or burden the due course of such trade or commerce or restrict their common liberty to engage therein. (226 U. S. 525, 541.)

It is now well settled by several decisions of the Supreme Court that the regulatory power of Congress over interstate commerce may under certain circumstances extend also to intrastate commerce. In the Minnesota Rate cases (230 U. S. 352, 399) the court said:

> The authority of Congress extends to every part of interstate commerce and to every instrumentality and agency by which it is carried on, and the full control by Congress of the subjects committed to its regulation is not to be denied or thwarted by the commingling of interstate and intrastate operations. This is not to say that the Nation may deal with the internal concerns of the State as such but that the execution by Congress of its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce is not limited by the fact that intrastate transactions may have become so interwoven therewith that the effective government of the former incidentally controls the latter. This conclusion necessarily results from the supremacy of the national power within its appointed sphere. (See also Houston & Texas Railway v. United States, 234 U. S. 342, 351; Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Public Utilities Commission, 245 U. S. 493.)

And in the recent case of Railroad Commission v. Chicago Railroad Co. (Advance Sheets, 42 Sup. Ct. 232, 237, Feb. 27, 1922), arising under the transportation act of 1920, the court said:

Commerce is an entity and does not regard State lines, and while under the Constitution interstate and intrastate commerce are ordinarily subject to regulation by different sovereignties, yet when they are so commingled together that the supreme authority, the Nation, can not exercise complete, effective control over interstate commerce without incidental regulation of intrastate commerce such incidental regulation is not an evasion of State authority.

In Stafford against Wallace the Supreme Court held that the commission men and dealers at the stockyards are subject to Federal control under the commerce clause, because their dealings, although not in and of themselves interstate commerce, affect the free and normal flow of interstate commerce through the terminal markets. In that case the court said (Advance Sheets, 42 Sup. Ct. 397, 403):

Whatever amounts to more or less constant practice and threatens to obstruct or unduly to burden the freedom of interstate commerce is within the regulatory power of Congress under the commerce clause, and it is primarily for Congress to consider and decide the fact of the danger and meet it. This court will certainly not substitute its judgment for that of Congress in such a matter unless the relation of the subject to interstate commerce and its effect upon it are clearly nonexistent.

An act of Congress punishing forgery and utterance of bills of lading for fictitious shipments in interstate commerce was upheld in United States v. Ferger (250 U. S. 199), where the court, answering the objection that there could be no commerce in a fraudulent and fictitious bill of lading, said:

But this mistakenly assumes that the power of Congress is to be necessarily tested by the intrinsic existence of commerce in the particular subject dealt with instead of by the relation of that subject to commerce and its effect upon it. We say "mistakenly assumes," because we think it clear that if the proposition were sustained it would destroy the power of Congress to regulate, as obviously that power, if it is to exist, must include the authority to deal with obstructions to interstate commerce (In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564) and with a host of other acts which, because of their relation to and influence upon interstate commerce, come within the power of Congress to regulate, although they are not interstate commerce in and of themselves.

Federal regulation of contracts because of their effect upon interstate commerce is not novel. The antitrust law denounces as illegal every contract in restraint of trade. The contract itself is, of course, not a subject of interstate commerce, but it is subject to Federal control because of its effect upon interstate commerce, as will appear from the following quotations from court decisions. What is said in these cases with respect to combinations and conspiracies applies equally to contracts, because the act denounces contracts as well as combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade.

The act in question does not require that the defendants shall have been engaged in interstate commerce. If they were all engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce and they formed a conspiracy to restrain the trade of the manufacturers and wholesalers who were engaged in interstate commerce, that would make them guilty. Knauer v. United States (237 Fed. 8, 12; C. C. A., 8th Circuit).

It (the Sherman Act) broadly condemns all combinations and conspiracies which restrain the free and natural flow of trade in the channels of interstate commerce. Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Association v. United States (234 U. S. 600, 609).

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, among other things, makes it unlawful for persons engaged in interstate commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease, sell, or contract for the sale of machinery, goods, wares, and so forth, for use in the United States, or to fix or discount the price, upon condition that the lessee or purchaser shall not use machinery or supplies of a competitor where the effect of such lease, contract, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

In the recent case of United Shoe Machinery Corporation v. United States (Advance Sheets, 42 Sup. Ct. 363, 368), arising under the act, the court said:

It is insisted that the leases in controversy were not made in the course of interstate commerce and therefore can not be embraced within the terms of the Clayton Act. It is provided in the decree that it shall apply to all leases covering shoe machinery shipped from one State to the user or factory for use in another State in the course of or as a part of the transaction between the lessor and the lessee resulting in the making of the lease. It is true that the mere making of the lease of the machines is not of itself interstate commerce. But where, connected with the making of such lease, a movement of goods in interstate commerce is required, we have no doubt of the authority and purpose of Congress to control the making of such leases by the enactment of the statute before us.

Section 4 of the bill deals not only with futures which are but also with those which may be used in connection with actual transactions in interstate commerce. Precedent for this is found in section 3 of the Clayton Act, which makes unlawful leases, contracts, or sales of the character above indicated where the effect of such lease, contract, or sale, or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce. The granting of an injunction under this section was affirmed in the recent case of United Shoe Machinery Corporation against United States, above cited.

The definition of interstate commerce is identical with the definition in the packers and stockyards act of 1921, except for such changes as are necessary to make it applicable to grain. This definition is based upon the decision of the court in the case of United States v. Swift (196 U. S. 396) and was upheld in Stafford against Wallace.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the word "manipulation" has become a bugaboo with the author of this bill. That is the thing uppermost in his mind, manipulations and gamblers, and he has a very erroneous idea with reference to the price of wheat, as he suggested, being manipulated from May 15 to May 31, because "the law of supply and demand" governs the wheat exchanges of the world, and it is impossible to control the market. Men have tried to corner the market and few have been successful.

I shall attempt to show in the course of my discussion that the Department of Agriculture itself, from bulletins issued, are responsible for the violent fluctuations that occurred in the May futures. There is one thing I want to call to the mind of you gentlemen particularly, and that is that it is a source of consolation for me to know that the Members of this House will have an opportunity to read this bill, consisting of 16 pages. This bill was never read either in Committee of the Whole or in executive session. Read my report and you will find where I call attention to this, as my minority report states. This bill was introduced in the House on June 1, and it was sent over to our committee the following day, June 2.

The Committee on Agriculture met and, without sending out any notices to the grain producers or members of exchanges or State officers or anyone who would be vitally interested in this legislation, immediately decided the hearings would begin June 7. Keep in mind, gentlemen, that the men interested in this legislation live from 1,000 to 1,500 miles from Washington.

If copies of the bill had been mailed to them immediately it would have taken at least a couple of days before they arrived, and the men interested, if they had desired to come to Washington, would immediately have had to board a train in order to get here on the first day of the hearings. They would have had no opportunity to consult with the directors or the governors of the exchanges or have had an opportunity to discuss with counsel amendments they would care to offer to this new bill, which is far more drastic than the original Capper-Tincher bill.

This is not a bill of supervision; this is a bill of annihilation. It goes considerably further than the other bill which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional. We started the hearings on June 7, and Mr. Morrill, assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, came before our committee and discussed the legal phases of the bill as far as the department was concerned. That was on Wednesday and Thursday. Mr. Gates, of Chicago, representing the Chicago Board of Trade, the greatest grain market in the world, had an opportunity to be heard, and on Friday Mr. Wells. We adjourned over Saturday because the Governor of Minnesota had sent a wire to the chairman of the Agricultural Committee asking that the chairman of the commission up there be heard. We were to hear him on Monday, but unfortunately he was ill. However, he sent two of his assistants. In the due course of events they would have arrived in Washington on Monday to appear before our committee, but there was a washout on the line up in Wisconsin. Their train was delayed. They wired the chairman of the committee, and also to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE], asking that they might be heard on Tuesday.

I said at that time that they should be heard, and other Members felt as I did, because we did not have sufficient information on this bill. However, without hearing these gentlemen from Minnesota, the committee began to consider the bill in executive session. We read the bill in committee up until about 12.30, and the clerk read up to the top of page 9. The bells of the House announced that a point of no quorum had been made. I moved that we adjourn and meet the following day to finish the remainder of the bill, so that we might have an opportunity to read, study, and analyze it, and give these gentlemen from Minnesota an opportunity to present and state their case to the committee. A motion was made, however, that we report the bill out. It was reported out without having been read or considered by our committee. This bill as it is before the House was never completely read in the Committee of the Whole or in executive session. This bill, that disturbs and may destroy a great industry in this country, has not received the consideration that it should have received. This bill, the predecessor of which has been declared unconstitutional, surely has not been given the time and consideration it should have received by the Committee on Agriculture. It is hasty legislation and is objectionable to the members of the exchanges, and it will be objectionable to the producers in whose behalf the legislation is attempted. The bill is not an attempt to regulate interstate commerce in grains, but merely an attempt to put future trading in intrastate activity under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Before the gentleman goes any further, I wish he would stop right there and elaborate a little bit. The gentleman from Kansas, the chairman, just made the plain, clear statement that this bill simply undertakes to regulate interstate commerce. Now, a man on the other side makes the plain statement that it does not intend to regulate interstate commerce. What is wrong? I would like to have that point elaborated a little bit, so that we may know what we are to do.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I say it is an attempt to make it intrastate by the adoption of the definition used in the packers' control act.

Sales for future delivery on board of trade are not in and of themselves interstate commerce. They can not come within the regulatory power of Congress as such unless regarded by Congress from the evidence before it as directly interfering with interstate commerce so as to be an obstruction or burden thereon. (United States v. Fergen, 250 U. S. 199.)

It is true that in the recent case of Stafford against Wallace, decided on May 1, 1922, the United States Supreme Court held it to be within the power of Congress to regulate business in the stockyards of the country and include therein the regulation of commission men and traders there, although they had to do only with sales completed and ended within the yards, because Congress had concluded that through exorbitant charges and dishonest practices and collusion they were likely, unless regulated, to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce passing through; but at none of the hearings held on this bill, either the last hearing or the previous hearing, has it been shown that any dealings have been interfered with or been a burden upon interstate commerce in the intrastate transactions that took place on the Chicago Board of Trade and other exchanges that deal in futures.

The majority report submitted by the Committee on Agriculture on H. R. 11843, known as the grain futures act, states that:

> This bill is intended to give the Secretary of Agriculture supervisory powers over the grain exchanges where futures are dealt in.

Here at the beginning of the report we find a statement which tends to conceal the real purpose of the bill. This bill does not rest with the mere giving of supervisory powers to the Secretary of Agriculture. If this were all the bill proposed, there would be no opposition to it. At the recent hearings representatives of the grain exchanges stated repeatedly that they were not averse to supervision, that they would, in fact, accept and welcome a bill giving the Secretary of Agriculture the power of supervision over their business, but to the present bill they were unalterably opposed. And why? Because this bill in its present form gives the Secretary of Agriculture complete and absolute control over the grain exchanges, control of the inspection facilities in the various markets, control of the forms of contracts used, control of the various grades of grain which may be delivered on these contracts, control of the premiums and discounts to be paid and collected on grain delivered on such contracts, control of the news items relating to the markets to such an extent that should a member carelessly deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other communication an inaccurate report concerning crop or market information or conditions that affect or tend to affect the price of grain in interstate commerce, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, together with the costs of the prosecution.

Think of it, gentlemen, should a member's clerk make a slight error in sending out a report the member himself would be held responsible and would be subject to this exorbitant fine and imprisonment. Could anything be more preposterous? Yet here is something even more preposterous than that. Note this inconsistency: That it is a crime to send out an inaccurate report relating to the market, but it is not a crime and no penalty is provided for under this bill for the manipulation of the market. Furthermore, it is a crime to send out an inaccurate report only when such inaccurate report is sent out by a member of one of seven grain exchanges of the country. It is not a crime for a member of any of the other thirty-odd grain exchanges to send out an inaccurate report, nor is it a crime for anyone not a member of any exchange to send out an inaccurate report. It is a crime, for instance, for a member of the Toledo Grain Exchange to send out an inaccurate report, but it is not a crime for a member of the Detroit Grain Exchange to send out the same report. A member of the Kansas City Board of Trade who sends out an inaccurate report, carelessly or otherwise, must be fined and imprisoned; but a member of the Omaha Exchange may send out the same report without molestation. A member of the Chicago Board of Trade who sends out an inaccurate report is a criminal, but a member of the New York Produce Exchange who sends out the same report is strictly virtuous.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. On what provision of the bill does the gentleman base his statement?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. On the sending out of inaccurate reports, because it applies only to the seven exchanges that deal in futures.

This bill would make the transmission even of United States Government crop reports a misdemeanor, for Government crop reports can not be other than inaccurate. They are merely estimates, and these estimates are changed each month in an effort to correct them.

I call these points to your attention and emphasize them for the purpose of impressing upon you just how far this bill really goes in its absurdities. The bill provides that a contract made on boards of trade shall be unlawful unless each board member shall keep a memorandum of such contract for a period of three years, or for a longer period if the Secretary of Agriculture shall so direct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to say that there was a penalty if any person sent out an inaccurate report.

Mr RAINEY of Illinois. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that statement strictly accurate? I notice on lines 19 and 20 of page 15 the language, "or who shall knowingly or carelessly deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication false, misleading, or inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information or conditions," and so forth. If he knowingly does it he ought to be punished, and if he carelessly does it in an important transaction there ought to be a penalty for such carelessness. Those two adjectives, "knowingly" and "carelessly," are very important.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I think if he should willfully do it he should be subject to punishment.

Mr. GERNERD. What is the difference between "knowingly" and "willfully" if the effect is the same?

Mr RAINEY of Illinois. The effect is not the same.

Mr. GERNERD. An inaccurate grain report, if willfully made and sent out——

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Crop reports are inaccurate and can not be anything else, because they are simply estimates.

Mr. GERNERD. Everybody knows that, and everybody knows the circumstances that enter into the making of a crop report.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. A year or two ago there was a report sent out by the Crop Estimate Bureau, in the Department of Agriculture, and it was charged in the House and elsewhere that that formed the basis of a great deal of criticism of the Department of Agriculture and the way they did business, because of their misleading the farmers and grain dealers of the country; so that it happens that Government figures are perhaps the same as any other person's estimate, and abuses have sometimes occurred. I agree with the gentleman as to the construction of section 9, if anybody takes those Government reports and sends them out. I do not think the committee intended that it should be drawn in that precise form. I think, as the gentleman says, the committee did not fully consider it.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I hope we shall be able, by amendments, to correct some of the abuses.

Now, a period of at least three years must pass before a member would know whether or not contracts were lawful,

For, should memoranda be destroyed accidentally or otherwise prior to the termination of the three-year period, contracts might, under the terms of this bill, be declared unlawful. Under this provision members of boards of trade would be held in suspense for three years or longer after each contract was made before it could be known definitely whether or not such a contract was valid.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I understood you to state that the validity of those contracts would be affected by this bill.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. It says the memorandum shall be kept for three years. If the memorandum should be lost, I do not know what other construction you would place upon it.

Mr. TINCHER. You say the validity of those contracts would depend upon keeping those memoranda accessible to the Department of Justice and to the Department of Agriculture for three years.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I think there is an intention here to affect the validity of the contract.

Mr. TINCHER. Is that the purpose?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. You hurried it through so rapidly that we must so construe it. If you had taken more time, the committee would probably have perfected it.

And yet the majority of the Committee on Agriculture, in its report to you recommending the passage of this bill, endeavor to satisfy any misgivings you might have concerning the scope and purpose of the bill by stating at the very beginning that "This bill is intended to give the Secretary of Agriculture supervisory powers over the grain exchanges."

Gentlemen, this bill does not mean supervision; it means annihilation.

In its effort to bolster up the theory that future markets are extremely susceptible to manipulation and control and to sudden and unreasonable fluctuations in prices, the majority report recites the action of May wheat from May 15 to May 31, 1922. The report also seems intended to convey the impression that the severe break in May wheat the latter part of May was the result of manipulation, and that certain market operators took advantage of the Supreme Court decision declaring the future trading act unconstitutional to manipulate prices downward. The report states as follows

It is admitted in recent hearings before the committee that on the 15th day of May, 1922, May contracts were selling in Chicago at $1.48. The next day, after the decision of the Supreme Court holding section 4 of the law unconstitutional, Chicago newspapers carried headlines announcing that wheat had advanced 4 cents a bushel as a result of the restrictions being taken off exchanges. It is also admitted that wheat declined from that time on until the 31st day of May, when May contracts had declined to $1.16 a bushel, or a total decline of 32 cents a bushel in 15 days.

In such an atmosphere of misinformation, misrepresentation, and innuendo as this the bill was born and has thrived so far. As a matter of fact, the prices quoted for May wheat at the hearings were not admitted by representatives of grain exchanges. In reality, the official quotations of the Chicago Board of Trade show that on Monday, May 15, the day on which the Supreme Court decision was rendered, the closing price for May wheat was $1.43, not $1.48, while on Tuesday, the day after the decision was rendered, the closing price was $1.45¾. In the big headlines in the Chicago papers, as the majority report called them, reporting this advance of 2¾ cents rise in price, no mention was made of the Supreme Court decision as having caused the rise in price.

We now find one statement in the report which proves correct. May wheat did decline from $1.45¾ on May 16 to $1.16 on May 31. In explanation of this decline, allow me to review the May wheat situation in Chicago. Here, again, the report makes misstatements and draws wrong inferences, and only by a knowledge of conditions reflected by prices for May wheat can an intelligent conception of the situation be obtained.

The facts in the case are, briefly stated, as follows: Beginning with January 2, 1922, the first business day of the year, May futures opened on the Chicago Board of Trade at $1.16. These prices worked upward then during the next two months, reaching $1.46 at the end of February. After some fluctuations at and below this point during March, April, and early May, the price began to work down in May and finally closed on the last day of May at $1.16, the same point, in other words, from which the May future had started 150 days before; or, in other words, there was first a rise and then a drop of 30 cents in May future. These facts are, of course, not subject to dispute. There is some dispute, however, as to the causes of this rise and fall in the May future. The reasons are not far to seek if a careful study be made of actual world wheat-market conditions, for it must never be forgotten that wheat prices are international prices, and therefore Chicago prices moved with world prices.

It is a very simple matter to give a full and complete explanation of these changes in price of the May contracts on the Chicago Board of Trade, for these reasons are clearly set forth in the weekly publication of the United States Department of Agriculture known as Weather, crops, and markets. The market news given out by this publication for the first six or eight weeks of the year was, in trade language, "very bullish." Whatever its purpose may have been, it was worded so as to bull the market, as I shall show, and it did have this effect. This bull campaign, carried on with such vigor by this department of the Government for six or eight weeks, put the price of May wheat up 30 cents. This price was wholly out of line with world conditions of supply and demand, and hence this high price could not be sustained. The Department of Agriculture then began to recognize the factors of big supply, weak demand, and falling exports, and reversed its policy of market news reporting, as I shall show. For the last eight weeks of this period, ending May 31, its weekly reports were bearish. This put the price back to normal, namely, where it had been on January 1. It was, in brief, a clear case of the Department of Agriculture bulling the price of wheat 30 cents a bushel and then turning to the bear side till there was a drop of 30 cents, all in the course of 150 days. I submit the following evidence to substantiate these statements:

Taking the Weather, Crops, and Markets for January 7, 1922, the first issue of the new year, we find the Government advertising an alarming situation in the world wheat supply, with supply and demand factors balanced so evenly that actual scarcity of wheat is likely to develop before the new crop arrives. It reports a surplus for export fifty or sixty millions of bushels below requirements, a condition of winter wheat of 76 per cent against a 10-year average of 89 per cent. The exact quotation follows:

The ending of 1921 had something more than a sentimental significance to the grain trade. First in importance as a market feature, the December future with its possibilities as a bearish influence at the close of the month, is now out of the way. Furthermore, the December Government estimate of the last harvest and of the winter wheat area sown in the fall are important features in December; and, finally, the trade can, by January 1, estimate with some degree of accuracy supplies and requirements for the second six months of the crop year.

If, by January 1 supplies appear ample for domestic needs and a fair surplus for export and carry over at the close of the crop year, and if, in addition, winter wheat crop conditions are favorable, the grain trade inclines to the bear side of the market. In the present instance, however, the opposite of the conditions mentioned obtains. Exports have been so great that the surplus for the remaining six months of the crop year is generally believed to be small, while the average condition of the winter-wheat crop is poor, as reported on December 8 by the Department of Agriculture, and the area sown to wheat last autumn was 554,000 acres less, according to the preliminary estimate, than the revised estimate of the area sown in the autumn of 1920.

* * * * * * *

Unofficial estimates based on the revised Government crop figures, issued on December 28, and the average domestic distribution during the last two years, make the amount of wheat in the United States that may be available for export in the next six months and for carry over on July 1 next, 96,000,000 bushels. Exports of wheat and flour in that period in 1921 amounted to 160,000,000 bushels, and in 1920 to 101,000,000 bushels. Allowing a carry over of 40,000,000 bushels on July 1 next, which is a moderate quantity, there remains but 56,000,000 bushels for export during the next six months. In addition to this strong statistical position the condition of winter wheat, as estimated on December 1, was but 76 per cent, against 87.9 per cent on December 1, 1920, and 85.2 per cent on December 1, 1919. The 10-year average of the crop condition on December 1 is 89 per cent. Not only, therefore, does the grain trade face a strong statistical position as regards the supplies from the old crop but a very uncertain position as regards the growing winter wheat crop.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, January 7, 1922.)

The effect of this market "tip" was to induce a wave of general speculative buying, which of itself tended to force an advance in price, for values are only opinions, and when the preponderance of opinions is bullish prices advance, and when crop estimates, reports, news items, and expressions of opinion emanate from official Government sources, they tend to make the public believe in a certain movement of prices.

On January 21 we find the "Weather, Crops, and Markets" repeating its reference to shortage of supplies and poor crop conditions, both of which pieces of information later proved to be wrong. The exact quotation follows:

The wheat market was between two influences and was somewhat affected by a third. A big visible supply combined with a very poor flour demand is a glaring reality of the present, and this had a bearish influence. On the other hand, an apparent shortage of supplies a few months hence has been and is a bullish feature of the market. Yet this is somewhat tempered by the fact that the winter-wheat harvest is only five months away. Even the very low condition of the crop in Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma has not had a very great sustaining influence on the July future.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, January 21, 1922.)

A week later we find more bull factors repeated, as follows:

BOTH WHEAT AND CORN PRICES GAIN STRENGTH DURING WEEK—BETTER FLOUR DEMAND AND INCREASE IN EXPORT SALES CONSIDERED BULLISH FACTORS BY TRADE.

* * * * * * *

The principal factors which were considered bullish by the trade were extensive buying of flour by the Russian Relief and the American Relief Administrations, dry and cold weather in the Southwest without adequate snow covering, and estimates by certain commercial agencies which showed farm reserves of wheat to be less than they had generally been considered to be by the trade. Better milling demand also developed so that the week closed with a strong and healthy undertone to the market.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, January 28, 1922.)

The February 4 issue of this official paper continues to bull the market in these words:

WHEAT PRICES SCORE ADVANCE OF 4 CENTS DURING PAST WEEK—STRENGTH IN FOREIGN MARKETS AND GOOD DEMAND FROM MILLS WERE FACTORS—CORN AND OATS STEADY.

May wheat at Chicago closed January 30 at $1.19¾, or 4¼ cents up from the close of January 23. The trend during the whole week was upward, notwithstanding the fact that there was a good deal of profit taking each day. The privately estimated farm reserves of 140,000,000 bushels, or 17.5 per cent of the crop, as compared with 264,000,000 bushels at the corresponding time last year, was an important factor.

The strength which developed at both Liverpool and Buenos Aires, together with a good milling demand, added greatly to the activity of the market, and the continued drought and cold weather in the Southwest were also strengthening factors. The advance at Buenos Aires was about 10 cents for the week, caused in part by the advance in foreign exchange. Corn was up 1 cent from the close of January 23, more in sympathy with wheat than from an improved demand. There was a feeling that corn was too low, compared with other grains.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, February 4, 1922.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DALLINGER). The gentleman has consumed 25 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I will take five minutes more.

The February 11 issue repeats the scare about bad weather and poor crops in the Southwest:

A further advance amounting to 8¢ was made in May wheat at Chicago for the week ending February 6. This advanced May wheat to $1.28¾, which was the highest price reached by the May option at Chicago since September 26, 1921. Higher foreign markets appeared to be the principal cause of the advance, but continued unfavorable weather for the wheat crop in the Southwest and a better milling demand were also important factors.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, February 11, 1922.)

By February 25 the bull market is nearing its high point. We find this official publication still repeating its statements about crop damage and small stocks on farms, both of which statements proved inaccurate in the end. The exact quotation follows:

GRAIN PRICES MOUNT TO NEW HIGH LEVELS FOR CROP YEAR—WHEAT RECEIPTS UNUSUALLY HEAVY AT KANSAS CITY—WEEK'S CORN EXPORTS 5,000,000 BUSHELS.

The continued advance during the week ending February 18 carried grain prices to new high levels for the crop year. May wheat advanced 7⅜ cents during the week and closed at $1.40⅜ on February 18. July advanced 5¾ cents, thus increasing the spread between the May and July options and closed the week at $1.23¾. May corn advanced 3½ cents, closing at 62½ cents. The same factors that have been the principal causes of strength during the past few weeks remained in evidence. The probability of heavy damage by drought and cold weather in the Southwest was one of the factors which apparently had considerable influence on the market. Higher foreign markets and reports of higher ocean rates were other factors. A good demand from mills also stimulated the future market, and the week closed with a decidedly strong undertone. There were some slight reactions during the week caused mostly by profit taking, but the market easily absorbed all offerings and buying remained aggressive.

* * * * * * *

Although no data are available as to the amounts yet to be marketed in the Southwest, it is reported that at many country points stocks are entirely cleaned up.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, February 25, 1922.)

The March 4 issue of this publication continues its bull influence in these words:

GRAIN PRICES CHALK UP NEW HIGH LEVELS FOR CROP YEAR—SHIPPERS IN IOWA AND ILLINOIS RECEIVE 50 CENTS PER BUSHEL FOR CORN DURING PAST WEEK.

The steady advance in grain prices which has been in evidence during the past few weeks continued during the week ending February 25 when May wheat at Chicago closed at $1.47 and July wheat at $1.26. Chicago May corn advanced to 68¾ cents and July to 70¾ cents, all new records for the crop year to date.

The same factors of strength prevailed as during the previous week. Chief among these factors were higher foreign markets, a good export demand, and unfavorable crop reports. It was claimed that the exportable surplus of wheat from Argentina would be less than previously estimated and would not exceed about 110,000,000 bushels, which would greatly decrease the amount available for Europe. Other factors which caused slight reactions during the week were reports of rains and more favorable weather in the Southwest, lighter buying by mills, and profit taking on futures. All offerings on the breaks were readily absorbed, however, and the week closed with a strong undertone in the market for both wheat and corn.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, Mar. 4, 1922.)

The reference to Argentina is contradicted two weeks later. The March 11 issue continues to publish bullish news, although the peak of prices had been reached and passed. These are the words used:

The grain market for the week ending March 4 was rather irregular, but at the close both wheat and corn were about 5 cents lower than at the close of the previous week. On March 4 wheat closed $1.42⅜, compared with the close of $1.47 on February 25. May corn closed on March 4 at 63¼ cents, compared with 68¾ cents on February 25.

Improvements in crop conditions in the Southwest caused by rains and heavy snows was given as the principal cause of the decline, together with less active buying by millers. Profit taking, which was quite general during the week, and lower foreign markets were other important factors. Considering the extent and rapidity of the advance some reaction was to be expected. There was generally a firm undertone, however, which absorbed the offerings and prevented further declines. Selling was said to have been by strong commission houses and was regarded as liquidation principally.

* * * * * * *

There was practically no export demand, as bids were still 8 to 10 cents below Kansas City cash prices. There was some inquiry at the Gulf ports, however, for wheat of the cheaper grades, which was the first time for some weeks that there had been any demand for grades below No. 2. It is estimated that about 600 cars are still on track at Galveston, compared with 1,400 cars one month ago.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, Mar. 11, 1922.)

This continued bull campaign not only put the price up, but it called forth from farms unexpectedly large stocks of wheat. The official report that farm stocks were low proved to be erroneous. From this point on the actual statistical position of the market is recognized in this official publication. A bear market is foreseen and forecast. The change of tone begins in the issue of March 18, in these words:

May wheat futures declined about 5 cents further during the week ending March 11, and closed at $1.37¼ with July at $1.17¾. This decline eliminates all the advance made during the past 30 days, and was caused principally, it is claimed, by the improved crop conditions of the winter wheat in the Southwest. Heavy snows and rain have fallen during the past two weeks in the sections which were suffering from the drought, and prospects for a good winter wheat crop were much improved.

Export inquiry has also fallen off, so that at present the forward export sales of wheat are said to be practically none compared with bookings for three months ahead at the corresponding time last year. There was evidence also of a heavy movement of wheat to European markets from Argentina and Australia.

Mr. Chairman, the department bulled the market from January 7 to March 18, when it reversed its policy and then became bearish.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HOCH. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that the prices are fixed solely by the law of supply and demand. Now, the gentleman says the bulletins of the Department of Agriculture bulled the market and caused a rise of 30 cents.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. The law of supply and demand does fix the price in the main, but when bureaus of the Government give misinformation to the American people it causes speculation and for a time it can produce a rise or a fall, up or down, although it can not last very long.

Thus weather, export needs, big exports from Argentina, new estimate of stocks on farms, all proved to be strong bear factors. The price was too high for actual market conditions. Instead of the scarcity predicted in January, the talk now is of "burdensome stocks" in terminal elevators. In the issue of April 1, this periodical reports the receipts of wheat at terminal markets for February, 1922, and shows the abnormal situation of February receipts being greatly in excess of January receipts. At Chicago the February receipts were nearly twice as large as the January receipts, showing that the high price had called out grain from farms and that farmers had got the benefit of the high price.

The April 1 issue of this publication reports the following bear factors:

FOREIGN MARKETS UNSETTLED.

Foreign markets were weak and lower. It was estimated that about one-third of the wheat and flour on ocean passage was on consignment, and the trade is considerably interested in the effect that the arrival and sale of this wheat will have upon European markets. A cargo of Australian wheat sold to India was resold to the United Kingdom during the week.

Weather conditions in the Southwest continue favorable, but it is still too early to determine the extent of damage caused by the drought.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, April 1, 1922.)

In this quotation the almost unheard-of situation exists of one-third of the wheat on ocean passage being on consignment. In other words, there was not enough demand over there to buy this grain, so it was being shipped anyhow, to be dumped on a weak market.

Early in April came the Government crop report—a bearish report when contrasted with the reports earlier in the year.

Early in May came the May crop report—still more bearish, since it forecast a crop of winter wheat 9 per cent above the 10-year average:

About 584,793,000 bushels of wheat from the winter crop is the May 1 forecast of the crop-reporting board of the United States Department of Agriculture. This figure is 0.4 per cent less than the harvested winter-wheat crop of 1921, 4.2 per cent less than the crop of 1920, 23.1 per cent less than the crop of 1919, but 9 per cent more than the average crop of the past 10 years.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, May 13, 1922.)

About the same time came the revision of the estimates of the India wheat crop. This made the India crop 100,000,000 bushels larger than last year's crop—350,000,000 bushels against 250,000,000 bushels. This surplus would be enough to supply one-fifth of all the needs of all the importing countries. In the face of these facts, how exactly opposite to the truth is the statement in the majority report on this point.

On May 27 this publication printed the following bear news on the market:

CASH WHEAT LOWER.

Cash wheat at Chicago followed closely the decline in the May option, and No. 2 red winter was quoted at $1.35½–$1.36 at the close of the week. Receipts continued heavy, totaling 1,454 cars, compared with 90 for the corresponding week last year. There was only a fair domestic demand, and export demand also was light. Elevator operators were the principal buyers. A good part of the wheat arriving was from Missouri River points, shipped for delivery on May future contracts.

At Minneapolis receipts of wheat were 989 cars, but only a small part was of a desirable quality. At the beginning of the week there was a good milling demand for the better grades, and the lower grades also sold well; but toward the end of the week there was little inquiry, and the mills appeared to be depending upon their earlier accumulations. Mills have been running at only about 40 per cent capacity and mostly on old orders, as buyers apparently are waiting for further development of the new crop before placing new orders. Conflicting estimates of the European needs and of the surplus available from other exporting countries, together with the uncertainty as to the production in this country, tend to hold trading in grain products for deferred shipment to a small volume.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, May 27, 1922.)

Finally the whole five-month period is summed up, and correctly so, in the June 10 issue of this periodical. The secret of the 30-cent decline is discovered. It is small export demand, light flour demand, and favorable crop conditions. And these are all world-wide factors.

BOTH CASH AND FUTURE WHEAT PRICES MAKE FURTHER SLUMP—MAY WHEAT CLOSED OUT AT CHICAGO 30 CENTS BELOW HIGH POINT—JULY CORN SLIGHTLY LOWER.

The principal feature of the grain market for the week ending June 3 was the closing out of the May contracts. May wheat at Chicago closed May 31 at $1.16½, about 30 cents below the high point of the range. May corn at Chicago closed at 60¼ cents.

The decline in wheat prices continued during the remainder of the week, and the July wheat future closed the week at $1.14⅝, which was 7⅝ cents lower than at the close of the previous week. A small export demand, a light flour demand, and favorable crop conditions were the principal depressing factors.—(From Weather, Crops, and Markets, June 10, 1922.)

There was no manipulation of May wheat in Chicago. Students of the situation know that the Government's statisticians erred in estimating both the supplies and the demands. There were, in fact, ample supplies of wheat for all purposes not only in the United States but throughout the world. The speculators who bought the wheat early in the year lost money. The sellers, particularly the farmers, made money. In fact, the farmers were the greatest beneficiaries of the rise in prices.

The Chicago market is used by hedgers universally. Thus wheat stocks in Kansas City, Omaha, and other terminal markets were hedged in Chicago during the period under discussion. These stocks were hedged by sales of May wheat in Chicago. When May wheat was sold as a hedge against these stocks at outside points it was not the original intention of the hedgers to ship the wheat to Chicago for delivery on May contracts, but when May wheat rose to the point so far above other markets hedgers had no recourse but to ship the wheat and deliver it. This wheat was delivered to speculators who had no other use for it except to sell it, and as these vast speculative holdings were thrown on the market after the middle of May prices naturally declined, reaching $1.16 on the last day of May, the price which wheat was worth intrinsically, and a price above which May wheat would never have risen had it not been for the vast speculative demand. And the speculative demand was almost entirely due to the bullish news published in official sources.

Mr. MANN. The law of supply and demand is based partly upon the supposed supply and the supposed demand. The Department of Agriculture or boards of trade may give out information respecting the supply or the demand.

Mr. HOCH. If the Department of Agriculture can give out misinformation, why is it impossible for other interests to give out misinformation and thereby manipulate the market?

Mr. MANN. It does not manipulate the market. It affects the market.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. The presumption is that Government reports are fairly accurate, and a great many people are influenced by them.

These reports did cause considerable speculation and the market did rise 30 points and went back to where it really belonged, May 31, at $1.16, which was probably what wheat was intrinsically worth at that time. Yet this month of May that has been complained of so vigorously by the gentleman from Kansas was the month that benefited the producer. It helped the farmers instead of hurting them. They got a better price for their wheat than they otherwise would have received.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman mean after the 15th?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. No; I mean from January on.

Mr. CLOUSE. While the law was in effect.

Mr. TINCHER. Is it the gentleman's contention that prior to the decision of the Supreme Court the farmer got more than his wheat was worth and that after the decision of the Supreme Court wheat got down to what it was intrinsically worth? Is that the gentleman's contention?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. My contention is that it was the result of information given out by the Department of Agriculture that the speculation occurred, and the price went up, and the farmer got a better price as a result of it.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman means more than its intrinsic value.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I want to ask whether I can gamble if I am a member of a grain exchange while, if I am not a member of a grain exchange, I can not gamble?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. This had only to do with the seven exchanges that deal in futures.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It makes them exclusive?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. And if I am not a member of one of those exchanges I can not gamble?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. The gentleman is correct. He can not speculate, except through a member of an exchange.

Mr. MACGREGOR. So it creates a monopoly.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. No. It will have a tendency to narrow the market if anything is done to reduce speculations.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman from New York satisfied with that explanation?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It seems to be all I can get.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yet the market, which has benefited the farmer in this way, is the market which these so-called friends of the farmer are attempting to destroy, and the operations in May wheat, which proved such a boon to the farmer in his time of stress and trouble, furnish one of the main arguments which they use to destroy the market. Gentlemen, it will be a sad day for the farmer when this great marketing system becomes so hampered and crippled through legislative enactment that its usefulness is destroyed, and it will be a sad day for the political hopes of those promoters of this bill when the farmer discovers what they have done to him and to his market.

The present grain-marketing system was no sudden invention. It did not come into being all at once; it is the product of evolution, of the irresistible economic law. It represents to-day the best elements of all the marketing systems of all the ages.

The Chicago Board of Trade was organized in 1849, receiving its present charter 10 years later, but the Chicago Board of Trade did not originate the present grain-marketing system. The Chicago Board of Trade merely adopted and proceeded to develop this system in the handling of grain. Throughout these 73 years since the board of trade was organized, these years of panic and prosperity, of peace and war, the Chicago Board of Trade has never closed its doors on a single business day. The grain-marketing system has been steadily improved upon until it has reached the point whereby grain is handled through organized grain exchanges with a lower percentage of handling cost between producer and consumer than is any other farm product or commodity. The present marketing system is a better marketing system than it was 73 years ago. Each year during those 73 years it has been developed and improved. It is a better system than it was five years ago to-day. And it will be a better system five years from to-day than it is to-day. The biggest step taken in the last 25 years in grain-exchange practices and toward improvement of relations between farmers and exchanges was the appointment of the Joint Conference Committee on Grain Exchange Practices about a year ago. This committee is made up of representatives of four grain exchanges, the farmers' elevator movement, and the United States Grain Growers (Inc.). This committee only recently has begun to function, and yet its efforts have already resulted in curing one of the most vexing problems existing between grain exchanges and cooperative elevator concerns. This relates to the rule recently passed by all grain exchanges providing that before accepting orders for grain for future delivery from managers of cooperative elevators, authority in writing to accept such orders must first be obtained from two officials of the cooperative companies, and memoranda of such transactions must be sent, not only to the cooperative companies, but to the individual officers as well.

This rule was passed primarily to protect cooperative companies from losses which might be incurred through dishonest speculation or injudicious trading by employees of cooperative societies and incidentally to protect members of grain exchanges from losses which might be incurred through accepting trades from cooperative associations without first having proper authority. The passage of this rule is illustrative of the present-day movement for a better understanding amongst all branches and factions of the grain trade and to bring about changes and improvements for the mutual benefit of all concerned. Conferences of this kind, with all parties seated with their feet under one table, will do more to solve the problems of the grain trade than any legislation can possibly accomplish.

If it is true, as this bill charges, that crimes are sometimes committed which temporarily disrupt the marketing system, no such regulatory law as this proposed law is needed to correct or prevent the evil. The Government, through the medium of the Sherman Act, already has ample powers to stop market manipulation, as was proven by the prosecution and conviction of Patten in the cotton case. Why pass unsound, uneconomical, unconstitutional laws to cripple a great marketing system and to destroy great business institutions, when laws already on the statute books would, if enforced, stop such abuses as may arise? Gentlemen, what we need in this country to-day is better enforcement of criminal law and less interference with economic law.

We have before us for consideration the most drastic legislation ever proposed for the regulation, or rather the annihilation, of business institutions. This is not the well-known Capper-Tincher bill of last year; it is only partially so; there have been new features added to this bill, which go further in the matter of control than anything ever proposed in the old bill. These new features are understood by few; no adequate time has been given to consider them; as a matter of fact, time for adequate hearings was refused in certain instances. This is hasty legislation, and hasty legislation is invariably ill advised. In attempting to force through this radical bill in its present form and in the present high-handed manner the leaders for the bill lay themselves open to the charge of using the Congress of the United States to promote their personal political ambitions in the coming campaign. More than that, this bill might be said to represent the pique, the chagrin, the venom, the spleen of these leaders, because their former bill was declared unconstitutional. This Congress has just been embarrassed beyond measure through the decision of the Supreme Court declaring unconstitutional the similar bill passed last year. I ask you, gentlemen, do you intend to allow yourselves to be fooled again by these same leaders, to be embarrassed again by the passage of another bill with features more drastic and more unconstitutional than the bill which you passed last year?

May I call your attention to some sections of the bill which in my opinion are unconstitutional?

It is invalid, as it is not a regulation of interstate commerce.

Like its predecessor, the future trading act, it uses a Federal power as a precedent to justify invasion of State jurisdiction.

It does not provide rules under which grain moving in interstate commerce must be handled in all boards of trade, but it does prohibit future trading unless conducted under Federal regulation in contract market, and in such market both cash and future trading are regulated. Thus an intrastate transaction is made the basis of Federal control and regulation.

It violates due-process provision.

Subdivision (a), section 4, arbitrarily exempts from prohibition owners or associations of owners of grain.

Subdivision (a), section 5, places State weighing under control of a Federal Government department at contract markets; leaves any system of weighing in operation in all other markets.

Subdivision (c) requires the impossible in prohibiting the sending out of inaccurate reports.

Subdivision (e) destroys the property right of members in the exchange and violates the charter contract between the State and the board of trade.

Subdivision (f) gives Secretary power to interfere with and destroy right of contract.

The application of this bill is limited to seven exchanges; it leaves unregulated the great majority of exchanges through which grain actually moves in interstate commerce.

It prohibits a lawful intrastate transaction unless boards of trade created and existing under the police power of the States submit to the control and regulation by Federal authority of such intrastate transactions.

Mr. Chairman, if this legislation is enacted, aside from the constitutional objections already urged against it, you will have a law which will not only interfere with the boards of trade throughout the United States but will prevent the farmer from marketing his grain with any degree of certainty. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] complains somewhat about the lack of consideration given to this measure when it was before the Committee on Agriculture. In my opinion very few measures have been presented to this body from that committee that have received the careful consideration and investigation that has been given to the bill now before the House. It is true that in the recent hearings before the committee conducted last week only two or three days were given to the consideration of this measure; but as a matter of fact this bill in all substantial respects is identical with the grain control bill that was passed in the last session of the Congress, the only difference being that in the former bill, known as the Capper-Tincher bill, which has recently been declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional, Congress sought to obtain regulation of the grain exchanges through the taxing power of the Constitution, and section 4 of that bill provided a tax of 20 cents a bushel on all transactions except transactions on regular boards of trade, which were designated as contract markets, and which were regulated, setting up a rather elaborate regulation in the Department of Agriculture that would tend, as the committee and as Congress then thought, to prevent manipulation and to control unreasonable speculation on the grain exchanges.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I will yield; yes.

Mr. ELLIS. I should like to ask the gentleman if he agrees with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] that only those who want to gamble on the grain exchanges of this country are opposing this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that it is my opinion that the opposition to this bill comes mainly from that class, the people who want to manipulate the grain markets of the country and who are engaged in gambling on the boards of trade.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the gentleman knows that Mr. Gates, of Chicago, and Mr. Wells, of Minneapolis, appeared before the committee and opposed certain provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And that the opposition is directed against those provisions?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That is true. Mr. Gates and Mr. Wells, both of whom I regard as very fair witnesses and both men of very wide and accurate information about these matters, did say that their objection to the bill was limited to one or two of the most drastic features of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They are not gamblers, are they?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I am not going to say about that. My opinion is that every transaction on a board of trade where the actual delivery of the grain is not contemplated is more or less a gambling transaction.

The farmers of this country have come to the conclusion that the grain exchanges are to a large extent places where wholesale gambling in their products is being conducted.

The Supreme Court, in its decision declaring section 4 of the Capper-Tincher bill unconstitutional, pointed out clearly the way in which Congress can in a constitutional manner undertake to regulate the grain exchanges, and it is under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Judge Taft says in his opinion that the main object of section 4 of the bill declared unconstitutional was to regulate the grain exchanges, and that was sought to be done through taxation, but it could not constitutionally be done. And it was held inferentially by the Supreme Court in various decisions that where Congress after a proper hearing announced a proposition as a legislative proposition and a finding of fact that the court will assume that that fact exists.

Now, this bill was prepared most carefully by the legal department of the Agricultural Department, and it starts out, on page 3, section 3, line 15, as follows:

SEC. 3. Transactions in grain involving the sale thereof for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade and known as "options" or "futures" are affected with a national public interest; that such transactions are carried on in a large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that the prices of such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and in foreign countries as a basis for determining the prices to the producer and the consumer of grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that such transactions are utilized by shippers, dealers, millers, and others engaged in handling grain and the products thereof in interstate commerce as a means of hedging themselves against possible losses through fluctuations in prices; that the transactions on such boards are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control, and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control, which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling grain and products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce, and make such business unsafe and uncertain from time to time; and that such fluctuations in prices are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain and the products and by-products thereof and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

That is a finding of the Congress of the United States on the evidence submitted to the Committee on Agriculture, and it is unquestioned that manipulation does exist on these exchanges. Men engage in transactions on these exchanges involving millions of bushels of grain, either buying or selling, where the actual delivery of a single bushel is never contemplated. It frequently happens that the entire wheat crop of this country is sold from seven to ten times over in the Chicago Board of Trade every year.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. No; I decline to yield. The farmers of the country, the millers, and producers of grain products for 30 years have been complaining about the manipulation and control of prices by men engaged in wholesale gambling in the products of the farm. That is all it is. This bill does not seek to destroy the exchanges in so far as they may do a legitimate business, because they render a great public service and nobody would destroy them. But it does seek to exercise a legitimate control over them, and the operators on the exchanges are to report the transactions on the grain exchanges to the Secretary of Agriculture, so that the Government may be in possession of the facts and may know about the transactions and whether or not they are legitimate hedging or whether manipulation of the market is attempted.

As the gentleman from Kansas said, the bill that was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court was entirely satisfactory to the farmers, the grain producers, and the millers of the country. It was not unsatisfactory to legitimate dealers on the grain exchanges. The Chicago Board of Trade refused to bring suit and it refused to authorize members of the exchange to bring suit testing the constitutionality of the law. There is no special objection to the bill from the great bulk of the grain exchanges and the grain trade—those who do not desire to corner the market or manipulate it to their own gain in transactions purely of a gambling nature. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. CHINDBLOM] asked me if I considered Mr. Gates, of Chicago, and Mr. Falls, of Minneapolis, gamblers. I make no such charges against either of these gentlemen. I have no information that either one of them ever speculated for themselves in grain. They are brokers and do act as agent for people who, I have no doubt, gamble on the grain exchanges. They make their money out of commissions received from persons who operate on the grain exchange, either as cash buyers of grain or as speculative traders.

This bill merely seeks to regulate in a proper way speculative trading in farm products on the grain exchanges.

It goes no further than that, although there is a widespread sentiment among farmers, and it is, in my opinion, a growing sentiment, that wholesale trading on the grain exchanges where an actual future delivery of the grain is not contemplated is pure and unadulterated gambling, and should be stopped. I have no hesitation in saying that the Chicago Grain Exchange, as it has been conducted in the past, is the most colossal gambling institution in the world. The farmers of America have made up their minds they will no longer be at the mercy of gambling speculators in their products—men who never handle in fact a bushel of real grain, but who deal in millions of bushels in a purely gambling transaction. This bill is merely to regulate and control. Unless it is passed and unless it cures the admitted evils of the present system of marketing the farmers' products, a bill will be presented here that will go much further and penalize, once for all, a system that makes the farmer and grain grower the victim of board of trade gamblers.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] is entitled to great credit for his work in support of this legislation. The bill bears his name, and very properly so. For 30 years the farmers of the country have been urging legislation of this character, but, for one cause and another, it has never been able to get through Congress. The gentleman from Kansas, by his ability and persistence, was instrumental in securing legislation at the last session. The Supreme Court having held one feature of that law unconstitutional, this curative legislation becomes necessary. I do not go beyond the limits of propriety, and merely give utterance to what every member of the Committee on Agriculture knows to be a fact, when I say that to the gentleman from Kansas, more than to any of us or all of us, belongs what credit is due for the enacting of this legislation. The farmers of the country and the great consuming public, whose good we hope to subserve by this legislation, owe him a debt of gratitude for his able championship of this measure.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, on the 11th day of April, 1921, Congress was convened in extraordinary session, and on that date commenced the stupendous task of rectifying the evils of legislation and administration that were proving so disastrous to the progress and prosperity of the Nation. No one professing to be familiar with the history of the country for the past few years and at the time when this administration came into power will dispute the fact that no Congress in the past and in all probability none in the future will have to deal with so many gigantic and difficult problems of government as confronted and have been dealt with by the Sixty-seventh Congress. The measure of success attending our efforts to bring order out of chaos, hope out of desperation, courage out of despondency, promise out of failure, prosperity out of panic, is entitled to and will go down on the fair pages of to-morrow's history as a glorious achievement in the preservation of the peace, progress, and prosperity of this great Republic.

The sting of death is sin and brings forth an immortal silence, but the sting of political defeat, while due to sin, brings forth calumny and vituperation against the victor.

Smarting as it were under the sting of defeat of yesterday, willing to go to any end to seek and obtain revenge for their overwhelming repudiation by the intelligent electorate of America, our opponents, unwilling to aid in the reconstruction made necessary by their mismanagement of governmental affairs, have sought to prejudice the minds of the people against this administration by their unceasing abuse and groundless criticism of alleged inactivity and incompetency. [Applause.] Political expedience can never justify a false accusation, nor can it long endure the crucial test of public opinion.

It is well for us to remember that when this administration assumed charge of the affairs of this Government there had been in the eight years next preceding heaped upon the shoulders of the tax-paying public a debt of $23,820,073,464.45, the annual interest upon which is $1,001,620,434.62. The interest on this stupendous debt alone amounts to almost as much as it required to bear the entire expense of this Government, including the Army and Navy, before our opponents were elevated to power in 1913. Much of this debt of $23,820,073,464.45 was piled upon the backs of the American taxpayers through mismanagement, inefficiency, and profligate waste. Our children and our children's children will suffer and toil to pay this debt long after the present generation has passed from the scene of action. I wish it were possible to describe in adequate language just what is meant by this huge sum of indebtedness. I wish it were possible for us to conceive its magnitude and appreciate the heritage that has been handed down to the generations yet unborn.

That we may have at least a superficial knowledge of its immensity and what it means to ourselves and our posterity; that our conception of the inimitable waste and extravagance may be made the more clear and lucid, I shall endeavor to visualize this vast sum of money with the hope that it may impress our minds with a stronger determination to salvage the wreck that was brought upon us.

If this tremendous debt were represented in United States currency of the one-dollar denomination, and they were laid end to end, it would make a string of money sufficiently long to encircle the globe at the equator 112 times, with $11,227 left.

The distance from New York to San Francisco is 3,191 miles, yet this amount of money which must be raised to pay the debt imposed upon us in the past eight years would, if represented in United States currency of the five-dollar denomination, make 181 lines between these two points with a 300-mile string left.

If the amount of our debt were represented in United States silver dollars it would require 29,775 freight cars carrying 50,000 pounds each to carry it, with 4,591 pounds left. Supposing the freight cars to be 60 feet in length, and allowing nothing for the space taken by the couplers, it would constitute a solid train-load of silver dollars 338 miles long with a string left five times longer than the Washington Monument is high. The sum of money necessary to pay the debt incurred under eight years maladministration would make a solid train extending almost from Portland, Me., to New York City; it would make a train of solid cars covering the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad between Washington and New York City, and if that train could continue on its journey until the last loaded car was leaving the Union Station in Washington, D. C., the engine of that train would be 110 miles on its journey across the Atlantic Ocean. It would constitute a solid train of silver dollars extending from the capital of my native State to Knoxville, Tenn., with enough loaded cars left to fill the main line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad from Knoxville to Chattanooga. The loaded cars required to carry our national debt in silver dollars would fill every foot of railroad trackage there is in my congressional district.

Had the meek and lowly Nazarene started counting at the instant of his birth and continued counting at the rate of $30,000 daily to the present time, there would still remain to be counted $2,773,160,000 of the debt we owe.

The annual interest on this debt, as I have heretofore said, amounts to $1,001,620,434.62. It is easy to read the figures, but it is difficult to perceive its magnitude. It is easy for critics to condemn, but it would have been far better had they preached and practiced economy at the time this huge debt was being piled and heaped upon the backs of the people. Let us look now and see just what this sum of money which must be raised every year to pay the interest on the national debt would look like if represented in United States silver dollars. Why, sirs, it would require 1,252 railway freight cars, with a capacity of 50,000 pounds each, to carry to the bondholders the interest accruing every year. Assuming the cars to be 60 feet in length, they would, if connected together, constitute a solid train 13 miles, 4,680 feet long. Assuming them to be 12 feet in height, they would, if stacked one upon the other, make 45 stacks of railway cars as high as the Washington Monument, with a little insignificant pile 49 feet high left scattered on the ground.

Yet in the face of these astounding facts and figures we hear occasionally upon the floor of this House malignant abuse and criticism, and read of certain assaults being made by the pie brigade of the opposition party, among them the now chairman, not of the Jeffersonian-Jackson Democratic committee but of the Woodrow Wilson international committee, Mr. Hull, who happens to be my predecessor in office and my opponent in the coming campaign, in which he violently assails this administration; criticizes it for undertaking to protect American agriculture, American labor, and American industry from the ruinous competition of foreign markets; blames and maligns it for not going into the League of Nations, and villifies it for not loaning to the bankrupt and militaristic nations of Europe $500,000,000 in addition to the $10,000,000,000 loaned by this Government to them by his own administration and by his own vote.

In one of these articles, which evidently he believed to be worthy a wide distribution among the people, in fact so much so that it was, either at his behest or at the request of his friends, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 1, 1921, he said, in speaking of the defeat of the Woodrow Wilson peace treaty, which in its true analysis was nothing short of an unholy, unrighteous, and iniquitous plot to surrender the sovereignty of this Republic to an alien-controlled supergovernment, that its defeat was "the blackest of all the black crimes committed in the annals of the human race."

Ah, I wonder if he is not satisfied with the contribution this Nation gave when it sent 2,500,000 of the best blood of the Republic to fight and die on the battle-scarred fields of France; I wonder if he should walk to-day through the silent cemeteries of that devastated land and view the mounds of clay beneath which sleeps the immortal dust of 8,000 American heroes, if he would then say that the defeat of that diabolical pact was a crime against the human race. Let his answer be whatever it may, but for myself, and for the future of America, I thank God there were enough men of courage in the United States Senate to stand up and fight for the preservation of the fought-for freedom of America and defeat that alliance, which would have involved our Nation in every war and in every strife throughout the world.

In the same article he ridicules the Republican Congress, whom, he says, in effect, prevented the Wilson administration from extending a loan of $500,000,000 to European nations in 1920, although that administration had after the signing of the armistice and continuing on up to September 28, 1920, loaned to Belgium, Czechoslovakia, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, and Serbia, out of funds that had been raised by American citizens, American mothers and fathers, out of the sweat of their brows, to maintain their sons upon the fields of battle, the enormous sum of $2,515,853,946.98. Let me read here just what he said in that article upon this subject:

> In vain did Henry P. Davidson and other great financiers as late as the early spring of 1920 fairly shout that the crisis is so acute that the situation does not admit of delay, except with the possibility of consequences one hardly dare contemplate. Mr. Davidson and many other economists and business men were then urging the creation of a revolving fund of $500,000,000 by this Government * * * to be placed in the hands of a strong commission of our ablest business men, to be utilized as temporary credits to the helpless States of Europe. This plea was received with deaf ears by Republican leaders, bent on every sort of pandemonium if it was necessary to enable them later to carry the national election of 1920.

I pity this Nation, with its 107,000,000 citizens, that there was not a pandemonium, such as he refers to, to break out among the leaders of his party on November 11, 1918, and by it saved to the American people the $2,500,000,000 loaned after war, without authority of law, and with little hope of ever collecting any part of it from some of the nations. Ah, I wonder why this critic of the present administration could not hear the cry of American farmers in 1920, when, with bended backs beneath the burdens of taxes and depression, they were crying for loans to bridge the chasm of deflation; when their crops, though produced at exorbitant expense were practically worthless upon the market, his administration, through the Federal Reserve Board, prohibited the further loaning of money on farms and farm products, and demanded of every correspondent bank that this policy be strictly complied with under the penalty of complete withdrawal.

I wonder why it was that Americans were denied relief while their means and money were being broadcast among the bankrupt and warring States of Europe. I wonder if they closed their eyes to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture when, on November 15, 1920, Mr. Meredith, a Democratic Secretary, in his annual report called attention to the deplorable condition of the farmers of the country, and in emphasizing the distress, he said:

> The depressed market situation is due, in part at least, to conditions following the World War and to the lack of buying power and decreased consumption in European countries.

He did not stop with this, but he went further, and said:

> The year's output, produced at an abnormally high cost, is worth, at current prices, $3,000,000,000 less than the smaller crop of 1919. Live stock and its products also declined to such an extent as to cause serious losses to producers * * * There is probably no other industry or business that could suffer a similar experience and avoid insolvency.

But let me follow this argument a little further and show you to what extent the farmers of this country suffered while their money was being loaned to European States, and while we are being criticized for refusing to grant them additional millions in loans.

In 1918 the wheat acreage of the United States was 59,181,000 acres, worth $31.80 per acre. In 1920 the wheat crop was worth on an average of $11.94 per acre, or a decline in value on the same acreage of $706,621,140.

The corn crop of 1918 was 104,469,000 acres, worth on an average of $32.70 per acre, but the crop of 1920 had declined in price to $20.93 per acre, which, on the same acreage, meant a loss to the farmer of the United States of $1,229,587,590.

There was sown to oats in 1918 44,349,000 acres, worth on that year's market $21.59 per acre, which had declined in value to an average of $16.61 per acre in 1920, or a loss to the farmer on the same acreage of $343,905,020.

There was a crop of 6,391,000 acres of rye, worth $21.59 per acre in 1918, which had declined in 1920 to an average value of $17.57 per acre, or on the same area a loss to the farmer on rye of $25,693,820.

The 1918 crop of buckwheat was 1,027,000 acres, worth $27.40, which had declined to an average value of $24.40 in 1920, or on the same acreage a loss of $3,081,000.

The rice crop consisted of 1,118,550 acres in 1918, worth $66.19 per acre, while the 1920 crop had declined to an average of $47.75 per acre, or on the same acreage a loss to the farmer of $9,442,562.

The loss to the stock grower of America on account of the unparalleled deflation was even more marked than that shown in the figures above. Let me call your attention here to a table which I have prepared showing the number of live stock in 1918 and their aggregate value, and the number in 1920, with the aggregate value, and then the total loss in the aggregate in the value of each class in the two years immediately following the war.

Loss to the farmers and stock growers within two years.

	Number.	Value.	Loss.
HORSES.
1918	21,555,000	$2,246,970,000	$582,804,000
1920	20,183,000	1,664,166,000
MULES.
1918	4,873,000	627,679,000	49,206,000
1920	4,999,000	578,473,000
MILCH COWS.
1918	23,310,000	1,664,231,000	152,331,000
1920	23,321,000	1,491,900,000
OXEN.
1918	44,112,000	1,803,482,000	556,817,000
1920	42,870,000	1,346,665,000
SHEEP.
1918	48,603,000	574,575,000	285,843,000
1920	45,069,000	288,732,000
HOGS.
1918	70,978,000	1,387,261,000	521,628,000
1920	66,649,000	865,633,000
Total depreciation for the 2 years			2,048,629,000

The loss, therefore, to American farmers and stock growers for this two-year period of neglect and deflation amounts to considerably more than $5,000,000,000. No other industry could have undergone such staggering reverses and survived; but this by no means represents the aggregate loss to the farmer as a result of rapid deflation brought about under the former administration. We must remember that prices on farm products continued to decline even to the last hour of the last day that they were in power.

I want to emphasize what I have just said by giving you the market price of certain staple products on the January market, 1920, and the price of the very same article on the market one year later, or in 1921:

January, 1920.

Corn, No. 3, Chicago	$1.47
Cotton, middling, New Orleans	.403
Sugar, granulated, New York	.1537
Wheat, No. 2 red winter, Chicago	2.63
Cattle, steers, Chicago	15.93
Hides, packers' heavy native steers	.40
Hogs, light, Chicago	15.12

Twelve months from that date, or in January, 1921, the market prices of the very same products had undergone an appalling and unprecedented drop, coincident with which the country, from ocean to ocean and from Canada to the Gulf, experienced the most crushing losses and the greatest annihilation of property values in the Nation's history. The market prices in January, 1921, were:

January, 1921.

Corn, No. 3, Chicago	$0.65
Cotton, middling, New Orleans	.145
Wheat, winter, Chicago	1.96
Cattle, steers, Chicago	.09
Hides, heavy	.16
Hogs, heavy, Chicago	.09

Yet, in the face of these indisputable facts and figures, the accuracy of which I challenge any man to deny, we see in the papers an account of where this same critic, Mr. Hull, in an address delivered by him to the women members of his organization recently, said:

> When the Democrats went out in 1920 we left 100 per cent employment at high wages, farmers thriving, with wheat bringing high prices, commerce flourishing, and prosperity on all sides.

If what he intended to convey was that when they went out of power they left 100 per cent employment in Government offices and bureaus at high wages, then I have no dispute with him, but if he intended to convey the idea that there was 100 per cent employment on the farms and in the factories of this country, or that farmers were thriving and prosperous everywhere, then I must, in fairness to myself and to my country, in justice to the truth of the matter, with malice toward none but charity toward all, deny the charge with all the emphasis at my command, and at the proper time and in the proper way respectfully invite the author of this statement to join with me in a joint discussion of these facts before the good people whom I now represent and whom he is seeking to be commissioned to represent in the Halls of this Congress.

WHAT WE HAVE DONE TO RELIEVE THE FARMER.

When this administration came into power, on the 4th of March, 1921, we found the agricultural industry in the worst plight that it had ever been in in the history of the country. It was evident to all that relief must be found and found speedily. Congress therefore begun an investigation of the conditions relating to agriculture, with the result that it was ascertained that foreign countries were dumping into American ports and upon American markets one and one-half millions of bushels of corn every month, which was paying no duty under the provisions of the Underwood tariff bill, and which if continued threatened the complete destruction of the farming industry of the Nation. We found along the Canadian borders millions of bushels of wheat waiting to be unloaded, duty free, onto the American market just as soon as transportation companies could haul it in. We found millions of pounds of frozen meats were being dumped onto our markets from South America, where cattle and sheep and swine can be produced at an infinitesimally low cost to the producer. These were but a few of the conditions confronting us when we went into power, hence to relieve the farmer we passed the emergency tariff act, which no unprejudiced person can study without admitting its beneficent effect upon American farmers and stockmen, and which in its operation has fully met and justified the expectations of everyone.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

In connection with the tariff act referred to we found that the agricultural interests were stranded as a result of the unparalleled deflation and an utter lack of adequate financing facilities. In order to relieve this situation and afford the farmers adequate privileges of obtaining loans necessary in the production and marketing of their products we revived the War Finance Corporation, and through this agency alone millions of dollars have been loaned to the farmers, with the result that they are to-day facing the greatest era of prosperity the industry has ever known.

FEDERAL LAND BANKS.

We found that the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks were wholly unable to meet the requirements of the farmers, due to the fact that the interest rate on their bonds was such as to make it extremely difficult to find a market for them. In order to obviate this situation and stimulate the demand for these bonds an amendment to the law was passed permitting the bonds to be sold at a rate of an additional one-half of 1 per cent interest, with the result that these bonds are finding ready buyers on the market and the loans made by them to the farmers approximate $650,000,000 since they began to function.

GRAIN FUTURES ACT.

The grain exchanges and boards of trade dealing in grain futures in Chicago and other large cities have proven themselves to be a menace to agriculture. They have so manipulated the markets as to destroy in its entirety the law of supply and demand in the fixation of prices. Their unrestricted, unregulated operations have cost the farmers of America billions of dollars in the past, hence it was evident that something, and something drastic, must be done in order to save the farmer from the fictitious and fluctuating markets created by this band of gamblers. We have therefore written upon the statute books a law regulating and restricting their operations, which in the years to come will prove itself to be the greatest factor in the prosperity of this, the basic industry of America.

The law has already proven itself a great benefit, notwithstanding the Supreme Court has declared section 4 unconstitutional, but by the enactment of the bill now under consideration we will remove every doubt as to its constitutionality and the future regulations of these exchanges will be certain and effective.

Other important measures affecting the farmers of the Nation have been enacted into law during this Congress, and the plans of those of us who have given our very best thought and attention to the betterment of rural and home life are concrete in character and must inevitably be written upon the statute books. Our financial system in the past has been formulated with the single view of encouraging and promoting commercial and industrial interests, while the agricultural industry has been left to work out its own salvation. This Nation can never enjoy its full measure of prosperity unless and until the farmer himself is surrounded by laws that will protect him from the ruinous competition of foreigners and by legislation that will enable him to finance himself in times of stress and deflation. Only in this way can the farmer expect to enjoy the full fruition of his labor, and only in this way can the Nation attain the zenith of its progress. Laws of this character are now being formulated with a view to further benefiting the farmer, and will, in the course of orderly procedure, be placed upon the statute books as a part of the permanent law of the land.

THE BURDEN OF THE TAXPAYER MADE LIGHTER.

Turning now to the relief that has been given the taxpayer under the present administration it is but fair to say that, while our critics were desirous of accepting a mandate for Armenia at the cost of keeping at least 59,000, and in all probability 200,000, of the picked soldiery of America upon the war-torn fields of Europe, while they were urging appropriations for an Army of 525,000 to be kept under arms within the continental United States, while they were insisting upon carrying out the 1916 naval program at an expense of billions of dollars, Warren G. Harding, that matchless statesman and patriot, called a conference of the powerful nations of the earth to meet in conference in the city of Washington to discuss disarmaments, and where by frank and open diplomacy on the part of the representatives of this Government treaties were negotiated and ratified by which the peace of the world is made secure.

Millions of dollars taxation which would have been necessary in order to compete in the mad rush for military and naval supremacy has been saved to the already overburdened taxpayer by this one mighty stroke.

We found upon coming into power an army of useless employees in the several departments of Government, many thousands of them duplicating the work of some other department or bureau, while thousands were being carried on the pay rolls for no other purpose than to pay a political debt to a former henchman. No sane business man would have tolerated for one minute the practices indulged in at the expense of the taxpayer, hence we established a Bureau of the Budget, and the director of that bureau is required by law to investigate each and every department and report to the President, and the President in turn to Congress, showing the exact needs and requirements of the several departments. As a result of putting the business of the Government on a business basis, placing the power and responsibility upon a department specially charged with the duty of effecting economy wherever possible, we have saved to the taxpayers for the fiscal year 1922 the sum total of $250,134,835.03.

Ninety-three thousand six hundred and thirty-four Government employees whose services were not needed were dismissed from the service during the year ending June 30, 1921, and in all 320,278 employees have been dropped from the civil pay rolls since the armistice. Suppose that each of this vast army of unnecessary employees were receiving $1,000 per annum—and this is entirely too low for an average salary—there was being paid out of the Public Treasury the immense sum of $320,280,000. This enormous expense has been stopped by this administration and the army of useless employees sent out to engage in productive enterprise.

Had the present Congress been under the control of the opposition and had they heeded the requests of their administrative officials they would have appropriated out of the Public Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, $5,600,000,000. We turned a deaf ear to these outrageous demands and reduceed the appropriations for that year $1,600,000,000 below what they had requested.

Through the revenue act passed by this Congress we reduced the taxes to be gathered from the public $818,000,000, and at the same time removed the thousand and one petty taxes that were collected on everything from a glass of Cherry Cola to a railroad Pullman ticket. Railroads have been forced to reduce freight rates and are in better condition to-day than at any time in the past eight years.

The cash reserve of the Federal reserve banks has increased within the life of this administration 37 per cent, and rediscount rates have fallen off from 7 to 4½ per cent. Liberty bonds, though sometimes difficult to find a purchaser, were selling at around 82 cents on the dollar when this administration came into power; now they are finding an ever-ready market at 100 cents to the dollar, with the result that the 15,000,000 bondholders of the country are approximately $2,000,000,000 better off than when we came into power.

PROSPECTS FOR THE FUTURE PROMISING.

While our critics undertake to belittle our achievements, the eternal truth stands out at every point to deny and refute their every charge. Instead of an army of 5,000,000 idle sons of American toil as existed when we came into power, there is to-day increasing demands for labor on every hand, and in some sections it has reached a point where the shortage of labor is very acute. Instead of a lack of money with which to carry on the business of the country, as was the case when we came into power, there is to-day billions of surplus cash in the banks of the country seeking investors and borrowers at low rates of interest. Instead of pessimism and distrust, as was the case before we came into power, there is shining on the horizon of to-morrow the golden sunbeams of prosperity.

I can not here refrain from reading an article appearing in the Nashville Tennesseean, a newspaper published in the capital of my native State, a paper that has found much joy and comfort in joining the critics of this administration for partisan reasons, but, when driven to the point, they publish an article which in fact and in reality shows their consistency doubtful and their knowledge of true conditions to be entirely different to that expressed on the editorial page of their paper. It says:

FORTY BILLIONS UNUSED CREDIT IN BANK VAULTS—RESERVOIR AT HIGHEST MARK IN HISTORY OF AMERICAN BANKING—BONDS JUMPED UP—FIRST-CLASS SECURITIES QUICKLY OVERSUBSCRIBED.

WASHINGTON, June 3.—Twenty-five billion dollars of unused credit lies in American bank vaults to-day, according to this week's statement of the Federal Reserve Board. Savings and State banks have another huge fund which they are most anxious to lend. While there is no method of measuring that sum, the Nation's banks probably have, all told, an untapped total of forty billions of credit available for business enterprises.

This great reservoir of unused credit has been filling rapidly within the past year and stands to-day at the highest mark ever reached in the history of American banking. It has brought about a situation virtually without parallel in our economic history. The man or firm who wanted to borrow money a year ago had difficulty in obtaining it at high interest rates; to-day he is courted by banks and investment houses. Hungry dollars are strenuously seeking his employment and at low rates of interest. The only thing he need have to get all the money he wants is prime security for his loan.

Every issue of securities, big or little, offered the Nation's investors by reputable houses within the past month or so has been snapped up with an eagerness born of hunger. Foreign and domestic issues alike are oversubscribed again and again. For instance, a $24,000,000 issue of bonds of the Republic of Bolivia was offered investors yesterday. The subscription books were opened at 10.30 o'clock. Five minutes later they were closed. The issue had been heavily oversubscribed.

TREASURY OFFERING OVERSUBSCRIBED.

The Treasury's offering of $200,000,000 in securities, paying 3½ per cent interest, was oversubscribed in every district this week. The Farm Loan Board's offering of $75,000,000 of 4½ per cent tax-free bonds, offered a few weeks back, was so heavily oversubscribed on the day it was offered that the board issued a few days later another $42,000,000 to take up part of the overflow.

The Canadian Government's $100,000,000 bond issue, put on the market about a month ago, disappointed thousands of investors in that they could not get a share in it.

Industrial offerings of prime value meet the same response. During the present week the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co. offered $35,000,000 of first mortgage, 30-year, 5 per cent bonds. The books were opened and closed immediately—with an enormous oversubscription. The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co.'s $22,500,000 of first mortgage, 25-year, 7 per cent bonds were absorbed within an hour.

The comparatively small concern seeking money likewise is embarrassed by the profusion of offers. The Utah Light & Traction Co. offered a few days an issue of $12,500,000 of 5 per cent bonds. It had to turn away investors from their doors. The Philadelphia Electric Co. put out a $7,500,000 issue of 5½ per cent bonds, and many investors failed to obtain as much of the offering as they wanted.

With the horde of investors, individuals and banks, clamoring for loans, interest rates are dropping fast. Some of the borrowers who had to pay high rates a short time ago are seeking to-day to pay off the old loans and issue securities at lower rates. An instance is the application of the New York Central Railroad Co. this week, made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, for authority to buy back, at a premium of 5 per cent, $25,000,000 of its notes issued in September, 1920, at a 7 per cent interest rate, and issue instead a similar offering which will pay but 5 per cent.

BANK EARNINGS CUT.

The effect of this tremendous pressure of idle funds has been to cut bank earnings materially. The Federal reserve banks, for instance, paid the Government about $60,000,000 in excess earnings as a franchise tax last year. In 1920 the payment to the Government was about the same amount. This year, however, due to lowered interest rates and the great volume of funds seeking investment, the Federal reserve banks will pay something like $5,000,000—a drop of more than 90 per cent.

Notwithstanding the excess of idle money, high rates have to be paid, generally, on second-trust loans on real estate. Bankers explain this by saying that the building trades are experiencing record activity and at price levels which appear to the bankers to be inflated. The bankers profess to believe there is an excellent prospect that houses selling to-day for, say, $10,000, in some localities, will sell in a year or so at lower figures. The high rate is charged on account of the hazard, it is stated. On prime first mortgage normal rates prevail, and demand for this class of security is difficult to satisfy.

Easy money and plenty of it continued to help business further back to normal during the week, according to reports received here. The movement of freight over the railroads continued to gain. The iron and steel industries were running at about 80 per cent capacity. Labor shortages in certain lines became more marked; and in other lines the employment situation continued to improve.

And now, in conclusion, I want to say, that, having an abiding faith in the intelligent judgment of the American electorate, knowing their spirit of fair play in all the adventures of life, their judgment shall be my judgment, their wish my will, this country our country, interminable and indissoluble.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, while there is much uncertainty as to the effect of this grain gambling bill when enacted into law, and while there is a very great conflict in the sentiment here in the House and elsewhere as to whether it will aid the producer of grain, I am going to support it with the hope that it will accomplish the purpose claimed for it by its author and the committee which has brought it to the House.

I come from a section of the Middle West where the raising of grain is a great industry, and I know that I would misrepresent my agricultural constituents if I failed to do all in my power to strike down the gambler who would rob them of the fruit of their toil.

Some time ago we passed what is known as the grain futures act, which regulated grain exchanges under the taxing power of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held recently that the act was unconstitutional, on the theory that we were not trying to gather taxes but were trying to regulate a business through the method of taxation. This act now under consideration, as I understand it, purports to regulate the stock exchanges under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, and in my judgment the main features of the bill will stand the test of the courts. When the other law was functioning, it is a matter of common knowledge that there was less manipulation on the grain market and less complaint about manipulation than during any similar period in recent years. I heard no complaint whatever. The law was held unconstitutional on the 10th day of May. Between the 15th and 31st of May there was the greatest depression in the price of wheat this country has known in recent years. There was a depreciation of 40 cents per bushel in wheat. It is argued that the price of other things went down. Yes; cotton went down 5 cents per pound and other products followed cotton to some extent, but it seems to me clearly apparent that when the restraint of the grain futures act was taken off the manipulators were again set free and gambling in wheat began in earnest.

As I understand it, there is a legitimate trade in the sale of wheat for future delivery, and there is a good faith trade in hedging, but to sit by and see our great agricultural wealth manipulated up and down by a few venturesome speculators, destroying the law of supply and demand, and gouging the poor producer when he is compelled to sell, is an admission that our kind of Government is not able to protect its very best citizenship.

In looking over this House and observing the gentlemen that are for the bill and against it, and in reading over the hearings and the many comments upon it, I have come to the inevitable conclusion that there is something in this law that has the grain gambler wonderfully worked up. I find the men representing the districts where stock gamblers live and where the stock exchanges are located fighting this bill at every step of the road. I believe I am in good company in being with the proponents of this bill, since I come from a splendid agricultural district. And while I am discussing this much-needed legislation for agriculture I want to go somewhat into the question of what Congress in late years has been doing for the farmer.

The meanest kind of lying propaganda has been insidiously drilled into the agricultural people that this Congress has not been their friend, and I am sure that there are many intelligent, fair-minded farmers who have been misled by this systematic falsifying, and who have not taken the pains to inquire into the record of this Congress and the preceding one.

The farmers' organizations have recommended several different modifications of the farm loan law. We have given them everything they have asked for in this regard. They have asked for enormous appropriations for long-term loans. We have made them over the criticism and opposition of the nonagricultural sections of the country. During the war the War Finance Corporation advanced money to promote the production and marketing of agricultural products. This Congress, in peace time, extended its life, broadened its scope and power, and poured into its treasury enormous sums of money—in fact, all that was demanded—with the hope that we could rescue the farmer from the falling markets which were fast bringing him into bankruptcy.

I am glad to say that these measures had a wholesome effect. Everything possible was done to encourage the exportation and purchase of his products. The railroads were forced to especially reduce freight rates on agricultural products. At the request of the farmers' organization we authorized the incorporation and functioning of farmers' cooperative holding and selling combines and exempted them from the provision of the antitrust law. Were it not for these needed pieces of legislation, no one can say what the fate of agriculture in the United States would have been. We know that it is the basis of our national wealth and that it must be encouraged and helped.

Under the Underwood tariff law enormous quantities of agricultural products were being imported into this country free of duty, every pound of which took the place of American products. We hastened to pass the Fordney emergency farm tariff law and placed upon the statute books a law which affords reasonable protection for the products of the American farmer as against the cheaper products of foreign countries.

I venture to say, however, that in the political hustings this fall you will hear it from coast to coast that the emergency farm tariff law was bunk for the farmer; that we export farm products instead of importing them. In a speech I delivered some time ago I showed, in a limited way, the enormous amount of agricultural imports coming into this country under the Underwood tariff law immediately prior to the passage of the emergency tariff act. The fact that importation of agricultural products has been reduced to an indifferent quantity since the going into effect of the emergency tariff law tells its own story. The fact that the prices of the farmers' products have increased under this law speaks more eloquently than all the goods-box political vaporizings that is possible between now and the 7th of November. At any rate, the farmers asked for the protective tariff on their products and we gave it to them to the exclusion of all other products. The New England States and the manufacturing districts of the United States have complained about our singling out the farmer for special favors and have bitterly arraigned the so-called farmer's bloc; and yet in my district in Indiana my farmer friends are being told that this Congress has done nothing for them, and some of them, not knowing the truth about the matter, have, to an extent, believed it.

Before the present tariff law was passed 1,500,000 bushels of corn were dumped into our ports every month from foreign countries. We found millions of bushels of Canadian wheat and millions of pounds of frozen meats from South America piled into our country as fast as transportation facilities could be afforded. That condition does not prevail now, and what imports are coming into this country have to bear a duty that helps to lift the tax burden off the backs of our people. The manufacturing centers complain of this emergency tariff law because they contend that it will make meat, bread, and corn products higher. Most of them voted against the bill, and yet, to my astonishment, I find some who purport to represent the farmer saying that the farmer of the Middle West should not be in favor of this legislation.

We passed the packers' act over the criticism and condemnation of many of you, who have since become its defenders. We believed the time had come when the great packing industry, which almost overshadowed the Government and was seeking to control every kind of food product, should be regulated. We believed they were not giving the farmers and stock raisers a fair deal. They cleverly tried to make the stock raiser believe that they were his only friends, and some of the stock raisers and farmers protested against the passage of the act. Its wholesome effect upon the stock-raising industry is now universally admitted. It remained for this Congress to pass this legislation, although it had been talked of for more than a decade.

We have now in the process of the making other laws which I think are necessary to the farmer, and the committees of the House have either reported them out or are about to do so. I favor a plan to extend Federal aid for intermediate credit to the farmer. It has developed that the short-term loan of 90 days is not suited to the crop grower and the long-term loan is not designed to aid in crop production and marketing of our great staple crops. Our live stock are neither produced nor consumed in 90 days. The need for longer term financing for our agricultural turnover is partially recognized in the Federal reserve system, in which provision is made for rediscounting agricultural paper for six months, but it is not adequate for the present needs. Bank deposits in this country as well as in Europe are in mostly demand deposits and can only be invested in short-term paper. This makes a short-term credit.

In testifying before our Committee on Banking and Currency on the War Finance Corporation bill, Mr. Eugene Meyer, jr., managing director of the War Finance Corporation, stated:

> It is time, however, to draw a sharp distinction between short-time bank paper and the question of the liquidity of the security that underlies bank paper, long or short. I maintain that the six and nine months' loans on wheat and cotton made by the War Finance Corporation to cooperative marketing organizations are as liquid, from the point of view of the security, as the 90-day paper representing advances to merchants and manufacturers. * * * While the modification of our banking conceptions and practices is essential to the more orderly marketing of our agricultural products, the live-stock situation in some respects, at least, presents greater difficulties, because, as I stated in my report to the President, the industry has never been properly financed. It involves a turnover of three or three and a half years, and there is no "home" to-day for live-stock paper of that duration. * * * As there is now no place in our machinery where loans on live stock can be obtained with the assurance that the money will be available for longer than six months, although the need is for two and a half to three and a half years, I think Congress would be justified in giving the matter prompt consideration. I know that many bills relating to agricultural financing have been introduced, but I would like to suggest that the live-stock situation be given a place of special importance and, perhaps, considered separately.

Another question which I think affects the farmer very much is the question of cheap fertilizer. This is not as important in my district as it is in the districts of many of you gentlemen where the soil has been tilled for a much longer period of time and where the methods of crop rotation and replenishing of soil has not received so much attention.

It is charged openly that the producers of fertilizer are in a trust and that they are extortioning upon the consumer. This may not be susceptible to proof, but I have no doubt that it exists.

The Government has spent $87,000,000 in building a nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and it is in no sense completed yet. We who have seen the failure of governmental operation of ships and railroads dread to see our Government attempt to run this, the second greatest construction problem of the Nation. The Panama Canal being a point of strategical importance, it is necessary for the Government to keep control of it, but I would hesitate to give my consent to the Government engaging in the private enterprise of making fertilizer unless the force of necessity required it.

I do want to see this great power plant completed, not only for the agricultural good it may do but for the preparedness it may afford us in event of war.

This administration has offered to lease it to private concerns. Two proposals have been made to the Government, one by New York capitalists and one by Henry Ford. I doubt if the New York proposal was made in good faith, and if it was I would be fearful that the Fertilizer Trust was behind it. The latter proposal, to me, does not seem to be hardly fair to the Government, and yet I do not know if we will get a better one. I would unhesitatingly agree to the Henry Ford proposal if he would unqualifiedly agree to make fertilizer. The farmer believes that he is agreeing to take the plant over and is unqualifiedly agreeing to make cheap fertilizer. His proposal does not go that far. He agrees to make fertilizer if he can make it at a profit of 8 per cent. He himself says that he will not make it unless he can make it at a profit and that he does not know if he can make it at a profit. He asks us to spend $50,000,000 more in the construction of the plant and to pay for its upkeep during the next hundred years, which may involve us in a tremendous responsibility.

I would rather give Mr. Ford all that we have down there and not take one cent in return if he would agree to make fertilizer and to keep the plant in operation continuously so that we might have it for security, for military safety, in event of war. But unless we have a better proposition I know of nothing to do but to take a chance with Mr. Ford. If it afterwards develops that Mr. Ford can not make nitrate at a profit and he turns this Nation's great investment into a power plant for his own use and profit we may feel that we have been cheated, but we will have the power ready for any use in time of war.

I wish I had the time, Mr. Chairman, to go into detail and discuss, even briefly, what this remarkable Congress has done not only for the farmer but for the country in general.

We have kicked out thousands of unnecessary Federal employees. We have declared peace with Germany. We have revised the tax law so as to make its burden more equitable. We have established the Budget system, after it was vetoed by the last President, and thus insured a businesslike establishment to control all Federal expenses. We have reduced appropriations for one year in the sum of $940,000,000. We have reduced our national debt $425,000,000 and are leaving a surplus in the Treasury of $300,000,000, and all this notwithstanding the fact that we have poured unlimited sums into the coffers of the War Finance Corporation, the Shipping Board, and the Railroad Administration.

We have reorganized the various governmental activities for the benefit of the World War soldier into the Veterans' Bureau. We have appropriated more than $30,000,000 for hospitalization of our late war heroes. We have passed the foreign debt refunding act, and our financiers are now working on this great problem that this Congress inherited.

At the insistent demand of the women of the country we have passed the maternity and infancy act. We have given some $90,000,000 for the building of roads, and $140,000,000 more for the years 1923–24. We have passed laws restricting and regulating immigration. We have readjusted the pay of the Army and Navy. We have passed the naval scrapping act and the general reorganization Army act.

In all we have passed 351 bills. A few of these remain unpassed in the Senate. It is hoped that all of them will pass through the Senate by the 1st day of September.

It would seem to me, gentlemen, that this is a remarkable record for a Congress who met under the most discouraging circumstances that has confronted any legislative body in many years. At the outset we were confronted with President Wilson, who vetoed many of the acts of Congress, including the Budget system bill and our declaration of peace with Germany. We had no power to discharge departmental employees. The great war having ended, 4,000,000 young men whose jobs had been taken by others were turned loose upon the country, and many of them could find no employment. Twenty-four billion dollars of indebtedness weighed heavily upon our shoulders. A burdensome and inequitable revenue law irritated the people. Our enormous overdevelopment in production could find no market on account of the unstabilized, economic conditions throughout the world.

But the last Congress set itself to the task of trying to reconstruct a wounded, restless Nation, and this Congress—a little over a year old—finds the clouds drifting away. Business is assuming its normal proportion. We find that the financial horizon does not look so dark, and those who were pessimists a year ago are beginning to realize that the solid, determined American character, when given a chance, will win; that the marvelous natural resources and the resourcefulness of our people will work wonders when given the opportunity. I am optimistic as to the future of my country. It is true when we see discontent, graft, selfishness, and demagoguery brazenly stalking across the land that we sometimes get discouraged, but somehow, with all the imperfections of our kind of government, and regardless of the temporary missteps and the wanderings of our people, their will triumphs and will eventually work to the good and the glory of this wonderful Republic of ours. Let us all have a little patience and a little forbearance until the great wound made by this most terrible war shall have been healed. All will be well with us eventually. Have faith in our form of government. Believe in the integrity, courage, and resourcefulness of our people. Do not expect legislation to cure everything; time will do much healing. Natural economic laws will help us solve our problems.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed to give my support to this measure. I supported the former measure, known as the Tincher-Capper bill, believing that it would very materially help the producers of farm products in this country. I regretted the action of the Supreme Court in finding it unconstitutional. I believe that the provisions of this bill will cure that defect, and I am looking forward to much advantage that will result therefrom to the grain producers of the country, in consequence of which, in line with all of my actions in this Congress and other Congresses in respect to matters along this line, I am very glad to give it my hearty support.

During the operation of the former act up to the date when the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional, May 10, 1922, the beneficial effects of the law were fully demonstrated. The producers gained materially in the prices received for their products and at the same time the consumer did not pay more for what he consumed, proving to all that such legislation was most wise and beneficial to both the consumer and producer.

The objection of the Supreme Court to its constitutionality, that this regulation through the taxing power of the Constitution could not receive its sanction, made necessary the provisions of this bill seeking to accomplish the same beneficial results by regulation through the interstate commerce act.

The great Committee on Agriculture almost unanimously reported this bill, believing that it cures all defects found by the Supreme Court in the former bill and provides other regulatory features which will prevent manipulation by grain exchanges detrimentally to the interests of the grain producers or to the consumers of their products.

The action by the House to-day, in approving this legislation, will be in full accord with the accomplishments of this Sixty-seventh Congress in respect to the many measures previously enacted into law of vital interest to agriculture, which is becoming more and more to be recognized as the basis upon which rests the prosperity of the whole people that if production is curtailed, which will inevitably result if agriculture can not receive that consideration in legislation that will make it profitable to pursue it, is becoming more and more to be realized.

I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want at the outset to say that I agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois that this bill has been brought before this House without proper consideration by the committee that has reported it. We are taking it up without due opportunity having been afforded those who are interested in it to know about the hearings in the committee. I want now to protest against the bringing a bill of this great importance to the whole country before this House under a rule that provides for only two hours of general debate. I want to say, and I want the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], whose attention has been diverted, to hear me say it, that I understand perfectly the policy that he is pursuing in putting this bill through this House under whip and spur. A year ago, when the old bill was here, he frankly admitted that he did not want to discuss the bill at any length for fear he would stir up opposition to it. To-day he comes in here, after having industriously aided in procuring the rule that allows only two hours of general debate, and in answer to my questions he proceeds to prejudice this House against the grain exchanges by explosive denunciations of opponents of the bill; by declaring with the emphasis that he only can command that every man in these exchanges who opposes this bill opposes it because he wants to gamble upon the exchanges of the country, because, as he puts it, he is a grain gambler. There is no way to return a parliamentary answer to assertions like that.

I want to correct a misapprehension. It has been said that the grain exchanges of this country do not object to supervision. Perhaps that will be true if you will define "supervision." But I want to say to you that the seven grain exchanges that would be affected by the passage of this bill are, every one of them, opposed to every provision in it from beginning to end. If this is what is meant by supervision, they will have none of it. The Kansas City exchange has millions of dollars invested in the facilities and instrumentalities that have made that a great grain market. I heard my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] in his remarks just now, but I call him to witness that he has felicitated me many times during this summer upon the high level of prices and the stability of the Kansas City Grain Exchange. Those men who have invested their money and have built up that exchange until it has become one of the foremost grain markets in this country, individually and collectively object to the domination of their private business by a Government bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is a war of extermination.

The authors of this Capper-Tincher bill are going forth to war against the grain exchanges of the country. It is a joint authorship, a joint sponsorship, that no property right or personal right of anyone who is connected with any exchange be spared; that it come to pass "that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu shall Hazael slay."

The bill of last year was to a degree redeemed by one section of it. It suppressed "puts" and "calls" and so put an end to sheer gambling on price fluctuations. The exchanges wanted that done; are profoundly glad it was done. That should have been done long ago by the States. But, since the States were neglecting to do it under their police powers, there was some justification for doing it under the Federal taxing power. That section has been validated by the Supreme Court.

This bill is to replace the one of last year which the Supreme Court struck down. There is nothing in it to praise; there is everything to condemn. The bad features of the old bill are made distinctly worse; there is nothing contained in it to redeem it. The old bill violated a party promise and an administration pledge to keep the Government out of private business. This bill does all that and more; it seeks to broaden the scope for governmental, bureaucratic domination of private enterprises. More than all, and worse than all, this bill reeks of populism.

These gentlemen from Kansas by this bill stage a renaissance. The agitation which finds expression in this legislative proposal began in the old seventh district at a time when Kansan Populists were drunkest with power. This bill is a hang-over from the populistic spree that painted red the whole State of Kansas. At the height of that economic delirium, in the wildest hour of that political debauch, the Populists of the "old seventh" made the destruction of the grain exchanges of the country a major scheme on their program.

Let me digress to recall another major scheme on that program which my friend did not approve. It gored his ox—his own ox. These same Populists proposed to reform the courts by abolishing lawyers. They made a spectacular start right there in the "old seventh." They elected to be judge of the district court, a court of unlimited jurisdiction, a farmer who neither had been admitted to the bar nor pretended to the slightest knowledge of the law. I recall an experience of my own in that court when that unlearned farmer was on the bench and the lawyers sat around in bewilderment, about as comfortable as a lot of rabbits in a burnt-over briar patch. [Applause.]

That experiment did not get very far, not so much because the gentleman from Kansas did not like it, as because it was put to the test. No populistic proposal lasts very long after it is put to the test. But the point I make is that the spirit of populism survived in the "bloody seventh" and the scheme to destroy the grain exchanges or snatch them from their lawful owners has persisted. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] himself told us last year during the consideration of his bill how the famous Jerry Simpson was at first commissioned to do the job. He told us that his distinguished predecessor had to go back at the end of some service here and admit to his constituency that he had learned something—something else than that fairly decent people wear socks. Some other Representatives from the seventh Kansas district have in their time learned something during experience in this House. Later came the doughty sponsor of this bill that is to be rushed through to-day under this rule. Last year the gentleman was frank enough to tell us that he was reluctant to discuss the measure, for fear of arousing opposition. The gentleman realized then, he realizes now—for my friend is never a Populist from principle—that not many on either side of this Chamber are hospitable to populistic proposals. But the time limit for debate fixed in the rule under which we are proceeding, and which the gentleman has been so industrious in procuring, indicates that the policy he pursued last year would suit his purposes to-day.

So I am in the first place opposed to this bill because it is a populistic proposal to seize something that belongs to somebody else—to get something for nothing. It is definitely provided—it is the one thing in the bill that is made sure by express provisions—that these boards of trade shall admit to membership the so-called cooperative associations of producers. The promoters of these associations are farmers who farm farmers; howling always of monopoly they would monopolize and appropriate to themselves the entire business in the grain markets of the country. Admitted to membership in these exchanges, these interlopers are to be free to use and enjoy the facilities, the instrumentalities, the reputation, the good will of these markets, which they have done nothing to build up. [Applause.]

They are to be permitted by the unfairest of means to get business away from the men who have risked their fortunes and devoted their energies in the development of these markets. Careful consideration of the provisions of this bill will convince any right-minded man that unfair, unconscionable advantages are accorded and permitted to these associations. If this bill is passed, these populistic associations will, if they can, and just so far as they can, ruin the business of every member who is now competing for trade upon these exchanges.

There is no reason to believe that such a monopoly, when it shall be accomplished, will better subserve the interests of the general public than any other monopoly subserves those interests. And yet, but for the deliberate purpose to create such a monopoly that will in the end confiscate these exchanges, this bill would not be before the Congress.

And, gentlemen, let me say to you in all candor, in all sincerity, that the hope of the proponents to pass this populistic proposal rests absolutely in the fact that you are expected to accept the ipse dixit of the gentleman from Kansas—in the fact that not one in ten among the membership of this House know, or have had time or opportunity to learn from the hearings or otherwise, the real truth about these grain exchanges which by this bill are to be brought under bureaucratic domination.

I am also opposed to this measure because I would keep the Government—and when I say Government I mean Government departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, inspectors, and agents—I would, if I could, keep the Government out of private business enterprises. This bill, if passed, will thrust the Government odiously and disturbingly into the private business of every business man upon every grain exchange in the country. In short, it proposes an absolute domination of the business done on grain exchanges. I do not believe, and I doubt that any considerable number of you believe, the experience of recent years, while we have fast multiplied boards, commissions, and like bureaucratic agencies—have been substituting for government by law, government by men—has convinced the American people that Government interference in private enterprises through these instrumentalities has been either wise or salutary.

I wish time would permit inquiry whether a single one of these experiments has been vindicated by trial. I shall not enlarge upon this or give expression to general views, except to declare that in my deliberate opinion, when the proper bounds and rightful operations of a private enterprise, big or little, may not be defined and controlled by law, no useful purpose will be greatly subserved by attempting to dominate or control it by a board, bureau, or commission. Of this at any rate I am sure: The American people are becoming mortally tired of having bureau agents nosing about as veritable snoops in their business affairs. The people realize, even if we do not, that we are becoming about as bureaucratic as Russia ever was. A change has been demanded. It may not be out of place that I have taken occasion to remind my colleagues of the majority that a change has been promised by the Republican Party. I repeat, this bill is an open violation of a party promise and an administration pledge.

Again, I am opposed to this bill because, even if it be conceded that government by law is a lost art; that we have come upon times when we must regard a clamor for government by men—and by men, too, whom the people do not elect, but whom boards and bureaus appoint—still this bill, in my opinion, responds to no business necessity, no economic urge, no real concern or demand of anybody anywhere, except it be a populistic desire and purpose to which I have adverted. Let me account for this new bill and the precipitateness with which it has been brought in here.

The Supreme Court recently held unconstitutional the bill of last year. My friend, the gentleman from Kansas, the author, not only, but as well the bureau of the Agricultural Department which had meantime been created or designated to administer the law—both author benefactor and bureau beneficiary had, during the months intervening from the passage of the bill to its overthrow by the Supreme Court, enjoyed the pleasurable reaction which springs from high hopes and joyful expectations.

The vision of multiplied bureau agents, bureau inspectors, bureau auditors, bureau solicitors, bureau carpetbaggers swarming about the grain exchanges of the country had become almost a reality. What could possibly better insure a triumphal return of a Kansas Congressman to a waiting constituency of populistic leanings—be more likely to evoke plaudits of "well done"—than to be able to proclaim the capture of such objectives, to boast an undisputed control and complete bureaucratic domination of the grain markets of the whole country? Mr. Chairman, we could hardly expect a man of the rugged determination of our friend, the gentleman from Kansas, to suffer a disappointment of such proportions. That engaging vision had, indeed, become too nearly a reality to be allowed to perish.

So we the more readily understand how it is that we are brought so quickly face to face with a new bill, changed from necessity in some details, changed deliberately to serve bureaucratic purposes in others, as we shall see, but unchanged as respects objectives.

The bureaucratic features of the old bill were declared unconstitutional because an improper exercise of taxing power was invoked. There was no pretense in or concerning the old bill that the proposed interference with the purely intrastate business in which grain exchanges are engaged could be justified under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The recent decision points out that interstate commerce was not even mentioned in title or text in that bill. It is true—and I cheerfully accredit the fact for such use as the proponents of this measure may care to make of it—that the writer of the opinion, the distinguished Chief Justice, was prompted to depart somewhat from the direct path to his conclusions to suggest another possible basis for the bureaucratic sway the promoters of this legislation have so ardently craved. Of the gratuitous suggestions promptly seized upon by the bureau solicitor who has framed this new bill, I will say only that there is reflected in that dicta a tolerance of bureaucratic control of private business with which I have neither sympathy nor patience.

The consideration most important to us here, however, is that a bureau solicitor has, as he admits, deliberately proceeded to frame this bill so that it will confer upon his bureau a sweeping control of the grain exchanges of the country and that will, later on, pass muster in the Supreme Court. It is absolutely a bureau bill—of the bureau, by the bureau, and for the bureau. A reading of Mr. Morrill's statement in the hearings makes this plain. Forced, by the opinion handed down, to recognize that grain exchanges are not engaged in interstate commerce—realizing that consequently there is to be found no express provision of the Constitution justifying Federal interference with their operations—the solicitor has sought to invoke certain implied powers, which rest wholly in recent judicial interpretations, to get within the range of fundamental law. The solicitor has sought to frame this bill under the commerce clause and has had to ask the Congress to make some ground for him to proceed upon. He wants findings of facts, and to supply his need has framed and asked the Congress to adopt as a preamble this section 3 of this bill:

SEC. 3. That transactions in grain involving the sale thereof for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade and known as "options" or "futures" are affected with a national public interest; that such transactions are carried on in large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that the prices of such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and foreign countries as a basis for determining the prices to the producer and the consumer of grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that such transactions are utilized by shippers, dealers, millers, and others engaged in handling grain and the products thereof in interstate commerce as a means of hedging themselves against possible losses through fluctuations in prices; that the transactions on such boards are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control, and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling grain and grain products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce and make such business unsafe and uncertain from time to time; and that such fluctuations in prices are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain and the products and by-products thereof and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

Mr. Chairman, the crux of this new proposal is section 3. Here is manifested an entire change of standpoint by the proponents of this legislation while this agitation has been going on. At first the primary trouble that was to be cured by this legislation was defined to be the dealings in futures. Coupled with this for slaughter has been the incidental, if not inseparable, practice of hedging. Dealings in futures and, as well, the practice of hedging against fluctuations in the market have always been by these proponents of bureaucratic control denounced as downright gambling; those engaged in those transactions have always heretofore been characterized and berated as common gamblers.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make my point clear. I want it distinctly understood that the proponents of this bill have performed a complete about-face on this matter of future trading. I want the membership of this House to see that when these proponents were seeking support for a bill which invoked the taxing power of the Constitution they sought to have us believe that dealings in futures were something essentially wicked and abhorrent. I want the membership also to clearly perceive that now when they seek by section 3 of this bill, by a preamble, by an apology for the provisions in the sections which follow it, when they seek by this shrewd method to get in under the commerce clause of the Constitution, they ask us to both believe and expressly find that these very dealings, which they have all along denounced as wholly iniquitous, are in fact ordinarily so wholesome and salutary as to be affected with a national public interest. They now propose to preserve and perpetuate these transactions in the boards of trade of the country, if it shall require every bureau in the Agricultural Department to do it. Even as late as the discussion of the bill of last year the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], in control of that bill, to induce support of it argued that fluctuations in prices were the direct and necessary result of future trading. I want to quote from the gentleman's speech of last year, for I want you to know that when it comes to executing a backward somersault the gentleman from Kansas is some gymnast:

During the war—

Said the gentleman—

the trading in futures in grain was prohibited by law, or by an arm of the Government created by law, and there was a time between the guaranteed price of wheat and the time when the boards of trade resumed trading in futures that has enlightened the American people considerably upon the necessity of gambling in food products.

You see how impossible it has been for the gentleman from Kansas to refer to trading in futures without characterizing it as gambling. The gentleman proceeds:

There was not any trading in grain futures during that time; there was not any gambling in grain—

There you have it again—and the market, while there were changes in the price, was what might be called a stable one. The very day that the grain exchanges began to gamble in grain, that day the fluctuations were manifest, and from that time on until to-day there probably never was in the history of our country a time when there was the difference between the price of the farmers' product and the price of the consumers' product.

There was, or could have been, but one interpretation of that argument. It was intended to make the point, and did make the point, that the inevitable result of the resumption of the trading in futures upon these exchanges after the war, which the gentleman characterizes as gambling, was to effect such a manipulation of the markets that never before in the history of the country had there been such a spread between the price to the producer and the price to the consumer. Now, if this argument had been sound, if there had not been something wrong with the premises in the gentleman's logic, or, if the gentleman will pardon me, some lack of candor and daring in advocacy and leadership, he would have done with trading in futures in his bill of last year just what he did with puts and calls; he would have suppressed those dealings by including them in section 3 of the old bill, which has been validated by the Supreme Court. But he proposed nothing of the kind in the old bill. The gentleman from Kansas was last year endeavoring to get a bill passed that would confer upon a bureau an absolute domination of these exchanges. He was, as he confessed in his speech last year, trying to say as little as possible about his bill for fear of arousing opposition to it. So he lambasted the traders as gamblers and inveighed against future trading as gambling.

The end sought in that bill and the end sought in this bill are identical. But, mark you, to support the theory of last year, to get under the taxing power, future trading had to be condemned as hostile to public interests; to support the theory of this bill, to impose bureaucratic domination under the commerce clause, future trading is extolled as something that must be preserved.

To define the issue still more clearly, let me put it another way. The contention heretofore has been that all trading in futures—the normal, ordinary, unmanipulated trading in futures—is iniquitous, is gambling; that it is always detrimental to producer, consumer, millers, dealers, the public generally. Now the contention is, as set out in the first part of this preamble, section 3, that trading in futures, as carried on normally, regularly, by the public generally and in large volume upon these grain exchanges, is wholesome, salutary, and serves useful purposes; that future trading determines the prices which are disseminated throughout the country and abroad for use of producer and consumer, and affords a means of hedging against possible losses by millers, dealers, and others.

All this and precisely this we find contained in the first half of this preamble. The facts about future trading are, moreover, in this first part of section 3, accurately and fairly stated for the first time, so far as I know, by any proponent of this legislation. If the case were to be rested upon these facts as so stated, then, in view of the holding by the Supreme Court in this recent case that these transactions upon these boards of trade are intrastate commerce, and not interstate commerce, Congress could not interpose bureaucratic control under the commerce clause of the Constitution. So, making a virtue of necessity, the bureau solicitor, special pleader, asks us to find as a further fact that these transactions, while normally wholesome and salutary, are susceptible of control and manipulation; that such manipulation and control frequently occur, producing a state of things which amounts to a burden upon interstate commerce and calls imperatively for bureaucratic regulation.

It will be observed, therefore, that the whole of section 3 has been painstakingly—perhaps I should not say cunningly—contrived to serve the one definite purpose. An entirely new theory and state of facts is now advanced to obtain constitutional warrant for this bill. Mr. Morrill, the bureau solicitor, admits in his statement in the hearings that upon this section he must rely for jurisdiction if a bureau is to take charge and dominate the grain markets.

In determining whether we ought to make the findings of fact the bureau solicitor asks us to make for jurisdictional purposes, it will be instructive to see what the only persons who pretended to know anything about the matters contained in this recital have to say. Surely little reliance can now be put upon the bureau solicitor, who confesses that he was trying to make the facts and findings fit and support his theory. Surely we ought to be influenced very little by the gentleman from Kansas or other proponents who had always heretofore insisted that future trading is sheer gambling. Mr. Gates, a member of one of the leading firms on the Chicago Board of Trade, a man of rare intelligence, large experience, a competent witness, who knew just what he was talking about, testified before the committee with respect to these particular recitals in section 3 that I have just adverted to and which you are called upon to verify. He says:

If you will go back over the hearings—

He is referring here to the hearings on the bill that was passed last year—

If you will go back over the hearings, you will find that grain men from all over the country came here to testify that this—future trading—was an essential part of their conducting business safely.

Mr. Gates was here referring to these sales for future delivery—these "options" and "futures" referred to in this section 3. He says these transactions, far from being regarded as inimical to safety, are "essential" to safety. And I remind you again that at that time—at the time of the hearings upon the old bill—these normal transactions on the grain exchanges of the country—common, ordinary trading for future delivery—were being challenged by the author of this bill and other proponents on this floor and elsewhere, and were being denounced as gambling transactions, the inevitable effect of which was to cause wide fluctuations. Mr. Gates proceeds:

There was nothing said about this making it unsafe; there was no testimony anywhere in the record to indicate that there were frequent attempts at manipulation. It was specified when it was mentioned that they (attempts at manipulation) were of infrequent occurrence and that they were very difficult to bring about under the conditions under which the market is controlled. (Hearings, p. 26.)

The only other man who appeared before the committee and testified from personal knowledge—or at all, for that matter—as to the fact and the frequency of manipulation—corners, as they are commonly referred to—was Mr. Frederick B. Wells, of Minneapolis, Minn. Mr. Wells is a man of the same high character as Mr. Gates, whose manifest frankness and candor you will commend, and who spoke out of a large experience and from an ample knowledge of the whole matter. He says:

I fail to find in the record any testimony from men of experience that transactions are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control. It has been admitted that at times, under abnormal conditions, there have been evidences of manipulation, possibly there has been manipulation, but it is not a continuing feature of the markets; it is something which happens in all kinds of markets under abnormal conditions. (Hearings, p. 56.)

I want to say for myself I sat through the brief hearings accorded on this bill and I read last year the hearings before the committee on the old bill. These grain men are entirely right in their contentions. The bill, as I have shown you, then proceeded upon an entirely different theory. No one who knew, or who pretended to know, how business is conducted on these exchanges contended, either from the standpoint of a proponent of or an opponent of the bill, that these infrequent manipulations or plunging speculations upon the market made the normal business of these exchanges unsafe or affected them in any way with a national public interest. This question is mooted for the first time in this bill. Proponents are, as I have said, now simply seeking to make virtue of necessity.

If the members of this committee by their votes leave this section 3 in this bill, they will do it upon the ipse dixit of the framer of the bill, without any supporting evidence, without consideration of any primary facts upon which and from which they may be justified in reaching sound conclusions. The primary facts, so far as they are available, all point the other way. If, having adopted this preamble, we, in Committee of the Whole, accept the provisions in the subsequent sections of this bill, empower the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint an indefinite number of bureau agents and inspectors and turn them loose upon these grain exchanges—to revise rules, change methods, prescribe new forms of contract, dictate and interfere at every point, and to supervise every transaction—we will place the burden of an enormous expense upon the taxpayers of this country, while, without doing the least good, we are doing incalculable harm. There has been developed in these hearings no complaint on the part of the producers, consumers, millers, dealers, anybody, of the general methods, the everyday business, the normal operations of these grain exchanges. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the rules, regulations, methods, forms of contracts—both as regards the making and the performance of contracts—which prevail in these exchanges are not easily understood by the uninitiated; neither are the arguments and reasons for many of them easily comprehended. They have not been made out of hand by experimenters or adventurers in the business of handling grain. They have been evolved out of long experience. They have been a natural growth, responding to many requirements and to protect a variety of interests. They make for simplicity, economy of time, the saving of waste and expense, definiteness in bargains, avoidance of disputes and litigation, certainty of performance, protection of buyer, seller, and all others directly or indirectly concerned in the multiplied transactions of a busy market.

Discussion in these hearings of rules, methods, practices, transactions upon these exchanges has tended to establish that the greater the business of an exchange the greater the number, variety, and volume of transactions—yes, if you please, of speculations, in the ordinary, dictionary meaning of the term—the less likelihood there is of manipulation, the better the price to the producer, the more stable and satisfactory the market to millers, dealers, and consumers; that the more you restrict transactions by artificial and unnatural hindrances to trade—the more you interfere and impose shackles—the poorer, more unstable, and less satisfactory the market to everybody. Of this Mr. Wells had this to say:

Anything that is done to narrow the trade on the markets facilitates manipulation. There is no question about that. It is a great deal easier to manipulate a narrow market up or down than it is a broad, liquid market, because the manipulator does not meet with the opposition that he would where there was a great volume of trade. I think you should bear that in mind in connection with any restrictions which you place upon future trading which would tend to limit or reduce the volume of trading. (Hearings, p. 64.)

The grain business is sui generis. There is, Mr. Chairman, no other business in the world that rests so much upon a constant exercise of individual judgment, or calls for finer exercise of individual judgment and courageous initiative than does the grain business. It is a business that is not only affected by mutable conditions of supply and demand the world over but by uncontrollable accidents of wind and weather the world over. With these men, whose transactions, as this bill recites, determine world-wide prices, a nice balancing of probabilities upon ascertained facts, a quick reasoning with accuracy and daring from cause to effect, are matters of daily, even hourly, necessity. Such business, composed of such men, involving such transactions, will neither function nor prosper half enslaved and half free.

And are not personal rights, property rights, to be given some consideration? Suppose it be true that at remote intervals, by abuse of privileges, a corner is manipulated on some exchange. These things, of course, do happen, but only, as the evidence proves, infrequently, at long intervals. How is it proposed to mend matters? By imposing permanent, bureaucratic domination; by imposing a virtual and wholly irresponsible dictatorship over the business. These iniquities when they occur do not spring from ordinary rules, practices, or conditions. They offend against and transcend, in both letter and spirit, all rules, practices, and conditions—constitute a defiance of rules, an uncontrollable mutiny against the established order on these exchanges. It is as if, because a refractory element in a community breaks out at intervals in crime or riot and defies authority, a permanent régime of martial law were to be substituted for republican government. Men, American citizens, belong to these exchanges, engage in business on these exchanges. American citizens, honored and respected in the communities where they live, invest their money in the grain business, erect warehouses, and provide the other multiplied and expensive facilities of a regional grain market. All is private property, and every bit of it is engaged in and affected by the hazards of private business. These men voluntarily procure memberships on these exchanges; voluntarily enter upon this line of business; voluntarily invest their money; voluntarily put forth hard, concentrated effort, by honesty, diligence, and fidelity to attract a clientelle, win success and prosper as men in other lines of business undertake to earn the confidence of their fellows, win success, and prosper. Are they to be treated as if boards of trade exist under compulsion? As if they have had no beginning and can have no end? As if individuals connected with them have had no choice whether to belong or to refrain from belonging? But that is precisely the reasoning and the attitude of the framers and the proponents of this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, the aspect of this legislative proposal most disturbing is the utter uncertainty as to how far bureaucratic interference will go or to what arbitrary limits this domination will be exercised if this bill should become law. No limitations whatever are fixed upon the exercise of the arbitrary power that is conferred. "Oh!" they say, "Mr. Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, can safely be trusted!" Suppose this be granted, Mr. Wallace will not always be Secretary of Agriculture. Moreover, we know that the Secretary himself will have about as much to do with it as will one of us. We know from experience, from the very necessities of the situation, that not the Secretary himself, but subordinates, will determine what in the way of control is to be exercised and how it is to be exercised. We do know that this bill confers more arbitrary power than did the old bill. Where the proponents took an inch before, they now take an ell; where before they went a mile, they now go a league. We can only judge of what they propose to do, or of what they will likely do, by observing first what has been set out here in this preamble and then by studying the provisions in the subsequent sections of the bill.

In this preamble we are asked to find that—the transactions on such boards are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control.

This is neither good English nor good sense. Probably the intention was to charge that in these transactions there is opportunity for speculation and that the prices of grain are susceptible of manipulation and control. So you are asked to find that the regulation of speculations upon boards of trade is imperative. What are speculations? The dictionary says that, in commerce, speculation means, "To buy or sell with the expectation of profiting by a rise or fall in price." What will the bureau be expected to do about this? Would the gentleman from Kansas have speculations suppressed? Or does he expect the bureau to so regulate speculation, the buying and selling of grain, that his constituents will all the time get more for their wheat and my constituents will all the time pay more for their bread?

But they say prices are susceptible to manipulation and control. Granting that this is true; granting that it is deplorable; deny, if you will, that it is inevitable—how will the bureau interfere to regulate these things? If the Secretary of Agriculture himself were asked to-day how he would prevent it, he would tell you that he does not know how these abuses of privileges may be prevented. He would tell you that such a thing as preventing men who buy and sell grain from crossing the line at times from speculation to manipulation would be absolutely impossible. It is a bold thing to do; it is a hazardous undertaking; it involves a base betrayal of confidence, a gross abuse of privilege; but in spite of all this once in a while a man will do it, once in a while it will happen, and all the rules in the world and all the statutes upon the books will not prevent it. And yet it is proposed in paragraph (d) of section 5 of this bill that the bureau shall require as a condition to the procurement of a permit to do business as a "contract market" that governing boards of these exchanges must provide for the absolute prevention of manipulation of prices or the cornering of any grain by dealers at these "contract markets." If this prerequisite shall be prescribed in the law, no board of trade in this country could qualify. It would strike down and put out of business every one of them. Mr. Wells in his statement to the committee called attention to the universal desire in the membership of these exchanges to eliminate to the utmost of possibility improper manipulation of grain prices, but he told the committee what the committee ought to have recognized without being told, that it is impossible to prevent the misuse of privileges and facilities.

Of course, these boards of governors could make rules and, perhaps, do something else to discountenance corners and manipulations; but, as I have intimated, the manipulators of corners in grain have about as much respect for rules and like impediments as burglars have for safes and combinations. It would be quite as practicable and reasonable to require of a national bank before it could have a charter to do business that its board of directors shall provide in advance for the absolute prevention of robberies from without and larcenies from within. This paragraph (d) is an illuminating sidelight upon the arbitrariness and destructiveness with which the bureaucratic domination provided for in this bill is to be exercised.

I can not in this general debate discuss seriatim the objectionable provisions of this bill. I am now objecting to the proposal in its entirety. I am making the point that no interest will be subserved by projecting the Government into the grain business. I go further, and aver that the bureaucratic interference proposed will work injury to every interest concerned. I can illustrate by reference to paragraph (f) of section 5. This paragraph, like the others of the section, defines conditions and requirements to be complied with before a board may be designated a "contract market." The grain exchanges, as well they may, especially object to this paragraph (f). Mr. Gates, before the committee, remarked that the paragraph contained entirely new matter which, as he put it, "is more far-reaching in effect upon future trading than anything that has been proposed."

Mr. Wells presented to the committee the comment upon it of the Secretary of Agriculture himself. This is what the Secretary has to say about it:

Subdivision (f) is a new subdivision, not found in the preceding statute, designed to give the Secretary of Agriculture power to deal with the question of grades that may be delivered on contract, premiums and discounts, inadequate elevator capacity, and any other conditions that may have similar importance in relation to the prices and executions of contracts.

Mr. Wells addressed himself to this interpretation by the Secretary of that paragraph:

In my judgment—

Says Mr. Wells—

it would be absolutely impossible for the Secretary of Agriculture or his technical men in his laboratories to establish grades deliverable on contracts, or to establish premiums and discounts which would not have the effect of narrowing the markets very, very materially. And, as I pointed out a few minutes ago, anything you do to narrow the markets increases the ease of manipulation, which is the thing you are trying to defeat. The Chicago market, for instance, has a wide variety of wheat deliverable, different grades of different varieties, because of the fact that it has tributary to it a large number of varieties of different wheats. We know from personal experience that we can not rely on technical laboratory men to adjust these matters.

Further on in his statement, Mr. Wells, in colloquy with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], further refers to this paragraph or subsection and to the Secretary's interpretations of it. Let me give you the colloquy:

Mr. WELLS. To show you how these technical things work out, Mr. TINCHER, let me say this: I was talking with a man from Kansas City the other day, speaking about Federal grading. He said, "Well, they have got it to a point now where a car of wheat will come in, and we will say it was cut with a header and lay on the ground and became stained. We never call that anything but stained, and we would sell that to the mills, and they would never pay any attention to it. But now a technical laboratory man takes that stained wheat and holds it up to a certain kind of light, and then holds it up to another kind of light, and he says that is bran burnt. What does the miller do then? He backs right away from it; and whereas he used to pay a fair price for that to-day he says, 'That is burnt wheat and I won't take it except at considerable discount.'"

Mr. TINCHER. Is that the fellow that works for the Government that does that.

Mr. WELLS. Yes; the technical man.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, he ought to be shot at sunrise.

Yes; I want to interrupt this colloquy to remark right here that my friend the gentleman from Kansas will, if he succeeds in getting this legislation, observe many other instances of bureau "smart alecks" that ought to be shot at sunrise. But to proceed with the colloquy:

Mr. WELLS. But that is the whole tendency of the laboratory determination of these things. Perhaps from a scientific standpoint that wheat is burnt; I don't know; but it never made any trouble until we had these highly trained technical men.

This shows how the interference of technical experts, mere theorists, works out in practical business transactions.

The only answer returned by the proponents of this bill, the answer reflected in questions and comments of the members of the Agricultural Committee in these hearings, is that the Secretary will not be bound to go so far. But does that get anywhere? Do we not all know that when you open the way to any one of these bureaus of Government to exercise bureaucratic power, they go the limit? How this disposition manifests itself in practice is shown by the change in paragraph (a) of section 5. In the former bill only those boards of trade might be declared contract markets which, among other things, had official weighing and inspection service. During the year before the bill was declared unconstitutional the bureau got a taste of blood. The discovery was made that very likely not enough power had been afforded to enable the bureau to absolutely install and operate a Federal weighing and inspection service at each of these markets. So when this bill came from the bureau to the committee, it came with the added requirement that before any official weighing and inspection service could be available to a board of trade, it must be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. That was considered by the bureau solicitor, and I have no doubt he was right about it, as sufficient to enable the bureau to displace every State-created weighing and inspection service by a Federal weighing and inspection service, and there can be not the slightest doubt that that was the intention and purpose of the bureau when it wrote that added matter into this bill. The iniquity of this will be shown when that part of the bill shall be reached.

Mr. Chairman, this committee ought not to recommend this bill for passage. If a considerable number of the Members of the House study this bill in the light of the hearings upon it, scrutinize these provisions which confer bureaucratic power, this committee will not recommend this bill for passage, but will amend it by striking out all of it after the enacting clause. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HUDSPETH.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this bill regulating grain exchanges because I have never believed that any legitimate business is benefited by gambling. In the old days in western Texas, when the "knights of the green cloth" used to keep open 24 hours a day, it was contended by some that it was essential to the commercial development of the towns that gambling be permitted. While there were some interests there that advocated a continuance of these gentlemen who were nimble with their fingers, consisting mostly of saloon keepers, some livery-stable men, and a few hotel men, eventually law and order asserted themselves and these gentlemen were put out of business, and the towns went right on and developed much more rapidly without them.

In reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS] that these exchanges are essential to marketing the grain of this country and conducive to better prices, I would ask him if he believes the cotton exchanges in New York, New Orleans, and other places where they gamble in cotton futures and sell for the Texas crop 8,000,000 bales, while we produce only 4,000,000 annually, and for the whole country twice that amount of its production, have increased the price of cotton? If he does, then I say he had better go back, if he has any farmer constituents in Missouri, and talk to them about that proposition, and I think he will return here in a different frame of mind. Of course his farmer constituents in Kansas City might agree with him.

Mr. Chairman, there has not been a farmers' convention in Texas in 10 years that has not declared for this, or a similar measure. There has not been a farmers' convention in 20 years that has not declared against gambling in cotton futures, and I have a bill to put them out of business, but I can not get consideration of it. There is another measure that I am greatly interested in, but before I get to that I want to say that the same contention was made here when we passed the act putting the packers and stockyards under the supervision and regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture. It was contended that it would not be of any benefit to the producer. But placing the stockyards under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture has done this much good: The stockyards people were selling prairie hay to the shipper, for which they paid 40 cents a bale, for $1.25 a bale, holding the shipper up for a profit of 80 cents a bale. Since this law came into effect and the supervision of stockyards has been under the Secretary of Agriculture—and I trust he will be Secretary of Agriculture as long as this administration remains in power—they have not been able to hold up the shipper in any such fashion. I wonder whether the gentleman from Missouri will contend that that law has not benefited anyone in this country.

The bill to which I wish to refer, and in the interest of which I have obtained petitions from the retail merchants' associations and from the wool producers of the country, is a bill that has been sleeping quietly in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce since March, 1920, known as the truth-in-fabrics bill.

Now, what is that bill and who opposes it? It is a bill to curb profiteering and increase production both in wool and in meat. The hearings on this bill were held in March, 1920, and thus far there has been no other interest here opposing it except the man who wants to manufacture "shoddy clothes" and call them "all wool," which he can truthfully do at the present time, and deceive the consumer and purchaser into believing this shoddy fabric is made from virgin wool fresh from the sheep's back.

Now, let me say to the Republican majority—you are in control of legislation here, and have been for three years—why do you permit this bill to remain in the committee and, it would seem at the present time, "sleep the sleep that knows no waking"? Who is in favor of it? First, the wool producers to a man all over the United States; second, the retail merchants' associations throughout the United States, because they want to deal honestly with their customers and sell them what they think they are buying; third, certain woolen manufacturers of the United States, who desire to manufacture virgin wool fabrics and deal honestly with their customers, and who have for their competitors the "all wool" manufacturer, better known as the manufacturer of "shoddy goods"; and fourth, the plain people, the great mass of American consumers. I dare say, my friends, that four-fifths of the clothes upon the backs of every Congressman here have been converted into cloth from old rags, picked from the streets, and rewoven probably as many as eight times. Ah, you say, on account of the United States and the world producing less wool than we consume it is necessary to reconvert rags and clippings into rewoven wool in order to clothe the human race. I say, yes, that is so; but brand it "shoddy" if it is all shoddy or the per cent the fabric contains of shoddy material. This is just common honesty. Who objects? The lobby of manufacturers of shoddy goods. Why? When this bill passes they will not be permitted to further dupe the public. If they do they will go to jail, where all profiteers, rascals, and crooked people belong.

When you, my colleagues, go to your tailor and want a suit of clothes and he shows you an all-wool piece of cloth, how many of you believe but that you are getting all-virgin wool fabric? I dare say ninety-nine out of every hundred. The tailor is not misrepresenting. It is all wool, but probably rewoven from old clothes and rags a half dozen times. It may have been made from a saddle blanket, but it is all wool. Do you call for all "virgin wool" when you order your suit? No.

Now, you have your pure food and drugs act, compelling the honest labeling of your medicines, and the guaranty of the purity of the food you eat. Why not the same guaranty of honesty in the clothes you wear? Do you know how many pounds of wool last year were made from old rags and reconverted? Eighty-six million pounds, against 440,000,000 pounds of virgin wool—almost one-fourth. The manufacture of shoddy goods has been increasing in the past 50 years at an alarming extent—something like 50 per cent. What did that wool reconverted from rags sell for? Seven cents a pound. What did the virgin wool sell for on an average? Twenty-five cents per pound. Yet when manufactured in clothing each brought the same. The cost of the rewoven, or shoddy, wool in a suit of clothes is $1; of virgin wool, $4; but the purchaser of the suit has to pay as much for the shoddy suit as for the virgin-wool suit. They are both "all wool," yet the virgin-wool suit will wear twice as long as the other. Oh, you say, "A man ought to buy what he wants, and that he is not to be prevented from buying whatever he likes." This bill does not prevent that. He can buy what he wants, but he will get what he thinks he wants. He will not be deceived into buying something that he thinks he wants and getting something that he did not want—old, common, everyday and Sunday, too. Honesty is all the advocates of this bill are clamoring for.

The number of sheep in the last 10 years in the United States has decreased from 56,000,000 to 46,000,000—a 10,000,000 decrease. During that same period wool woven from rags has increased from 60,000,000 pounds in 1910 to 86,000,000 pounds in 1920, but the price of clothing was not reduced, for the shoddy manufacturer sold his "all-wool" clothes that he paid on an average of 7 cents a pound for the wool contained therein for the same price that the manufacturer of virgin-wool cloth received for his that he paid on an average of 25 cents a pound for the wool contained therein. Who is duped? The consumer—the men and women who purchase the clothes—certainly. Oh, you say we need substitutes for wool in order to clothe the people. I agree with you. No quarrel between us there. This truth-in-fabrics bill does not limit the use of substitutes.

The manufacturer may use all the substitutes he desires and any quality he desires. This bill protects the public by giving the people knowledge of the presence of the substitutes, or the ingredients entering into the woolen fabrics. The cotton manufacturer is as much interested in the enactment of this bill as the producer of wool. It will, in my judgment, enhance the price of cotton, for under it all goods must be truthfully labeled and branded. Every bill that has been passed or will be passed declaring for honesty in commercial transactions will be vigorously opposed and has been in the past. The pure food and drugs act, passed by Congress in 1906, was vigorously assailed by a lobby of manufacturers of adulterated drugs and unwholesome and insanitary food. Also the oleomargarine manufacturers vigorously opposed the act that caused all substitutes for butter to be correctly branded. Also the insecticide act, passed a number of years ago; but there is not a man in this Congress that would have the temerity to rise from his seat and ask for the repeal of a single one of these beneficial and salutary laws. If he did his seat would be occupied by another after March 4 next. I say this act will greatly increase the number of sheep in the United States and the amount of wool produced. Why? The answer is plain. The sale of substitutes without making their presence known always destroys the law of supply and demand that usually governs production—that is, it dislocates all economic principles. The unrevealed presence of substitutes works to the disadvantage of the use of the genuine article. If you go to your merchant or tailor to buy a suit of virgin wool and he hands you down a suit of "all wool," woven from rags, and you fail to buy the all-virgin wool fabric, you are deceived in your intentions, and the sale of virgin wool is thereby lessened. The sale of a substitute, where its presence is concealed, deprives the people of their right to choose between the substitute and genuine, forces them to buy substitutes against their will, and, last, permits the seller to obtain the price of the genuine for the substitute and thereby profiteer on the public.

The opposition claim it will raise the price of virgin wool. My answer is that it will probably raise it some, but not materially. It will certainly stimulate production, thereby causing more sheep to be raised and more wool produced in this country. But, say it raises the price of virgin wool 5 cents a pound, this will not mean more than 25 cents additional in the cost of a suit of clothes. Who would not be willing to pay 25 cents more for a suit of clothes when you knew you were getting an all-virgin wool suit? Some would say, "Would you stop the manufacture of shoddy goods?" I would not, and neither does this bill do such a thing. Shoddy goods reclaimed from rags have their place, and a legitimate use, in our economy. The manufacturer can go on manufacturing shoddy goods, and he can call them all wool if they are all wool, but he will have to state the truth, that there is no virgin wool therein and that they are manufactured from rewoven material. Here each class is defined so you will fully understand what is meant by each term as embraced in the bill I advocate.

You see advertisements daily in the newspapers of your town as follows: "All-wool suits and dresses marked down, half of former price." You go and purchase, thinking you are getting a virgin-wool garment. The seller is telling the truth. The garments offered for sale are "all wool," but in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the fabrics in those garments are rewoven from old cloth and rags. No one will contend that they could be as durable as cloth made from virgin wool. A certain chemical treatment is given these old rags and used clothes in reconverting them into wool again. The fiber being subjected to this chemical treatment is deprived of a great deal of the natural oil the virgin wool has, and also deprived of the oil by the wear they have been subjected to. No one will contend that when that fabric has suffered by wear, by age, by cutting or breaking, by the reclaiming process, the chemicals, the heating, the tearing and shredding and handling, all combined to weaken the process, yet it is wool, "all wool." Still, no one will claim for a moment that it is as strong and durable as wool fresh from the sheep's back.

The argument is made against the bill that it will cost the Government an immense sum to administer this law. Well, it is estimated that it will cost about 1 cent on each garment manufactured, or one-fifth of 1 cent on each running yard. Do you think the public would object to this additional tax when they know they will be getting honestly branded goods—just what they call for and what they pay for? I know they will not. Think of the immense benefits to be derived from such a small cost. It is stated that the administration of the pure food and drugs act costs the Government $600,000 a year. Do you hear a single taxpayer object to the cost of administering this wise and beneficent law? This law has saved the lives of hundreds of thousands of our citizens and protected their health. No one should place money against human life. Will this act be enforced? It certainly will. The penalties are adequate to guarantee an enforcement. If a manufacturer misbrands or misrepresents his goods, his registration certificate is taken away and his goods are not permitted to be shipped in interstate commerce; besides, the officers of the corporation are subject to fine and imprisonment where they knowingly violate this law. The retailer is protected in that he has a guaranty from the manufacturer as to ingredients in the fabrics he sells. There will be no trouble about its enforcement and you will get honest goods when this bill becomes a law, and it will be enacted notwithstanding the lobby of the "shoddy" manufacturers. You will see when the people fully wake up, as they are slowly being aroused.

Now, it is up to this great Republican majority, who promised the people so much in the last election in the way of relief and have done so little, to report this bill out and pass it. Oh, some say they are opposed to it because it infringes on State rights; that it prevents the State from regulating its own affairs. No; it does nothing of the kind. It simply provides for the correctly branding of all goods that enter into interstate commerce.

Congress could not pass a law that would infringe upon the rights of the States without doing violence to the Federal Constitution. It is true that sometimes this is done, but the Supreme Court usually delivers the knockout blow when the law reaches that tribunal. I am as strong a State rights man as ever stood on this floor, and if I believed that this bill in any way interfered with the States or their legislative bodies in regulating commerce or manufacturing within the States, I would oppose it as vehemently as I opposed the Esch-Cummins Act, which destroyed all regulating of railroads by State tribunals within the respective States and lodged the sole power of all rate making with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, why does the majority party refuse to permit this bill to be reported out of the committee? Every farm journal and almost every farm organization in the United States are advocating the passage of this bill. The retail merchants want it, the woolgrowers' associations everywhere are clamoring for it, the Texas Sheep and Wool Growers' Association, one of the largest organizations of its kind in this country, that meet in annual session to-morrow in my district, will resolve strongly in favor of it by a unanimous vote. Leading journals everywhere, like the New York World and the Chicago Tribune, are advocating it in the strongest kind of editorials. This newspaper advocacy reaches as far west as the Los Angeles Herald, in California. The great consuming public are demanding it; that means the laborer, the professional man, the stockman, and the farmer. The plain folks everywhere want it. Who are opposing it? The manufacturer of shoddy goods. There were 68 manufacturers of "all-shoddy goods" in 1914 and 82 in 1919. Well, where lies their power in preventing this legislation from even emerging from a committee? You Republicans are responsible for legislation or a failure of proposed legislation. These 82 manufacturers, in voting strength, are a mere bagatelle as compared with the rest of the country. Then their strength must lie in the fact that they donate somewhat liberally to Republican campaign funds. Well, you will need all their surplus that they have squeezed from the people and fraudulently wrung from their pockets by selling them a substitute as genuine when the election rolls around this fall.

If you do not pass this bill now, with your 169 majority, the people will send a Congress here, after the 4th of next March, who will listen to the voice of the folks back home, and not the whisper of the interests, who not only want special favors but a dishonest advantage, that will pass it. You can not render one valid excuse why this bill should have lain in committee three long years.

I am going to talk a little plain, but I am going to stay within the facts. Listen: Selling a substitute as the genuine is a lie and a fraud, and the propriety of the act is no more open to debate than would be the act of stealing. Forget about your campaign fund as far as the interest mentioned is concerned—you can get plenty from many other special interests—and commit yourself to an act that will benefit the whole people. Pass this bill and small bunches of sheep will spring up on every farm in this country, greatly increasing our supply of meat and clothing. The farmer will raise more wool and better wool when he knows his virgin wool will not be sold in competition with rags. Oh, the cry of the ragpicker will still resound throughout our streets and alleys, but he will have to remove his mask and come out in the sunlight; so will the man who manufactures his goods. I am so wedded to the virtues of this measure—and I see no defects—that I am going to make it din in your ears from day to day until you will see the words "truth in fabrics" chasing each other up and down the wall in your slumber, and it will not be peaceful slumber as November draws near if you don't respond to the wishes of the people in this matter. The people back home are also becoming aroused and are expressing themselves through their various associations. You have not heard the last of this by any means. And the shoddy manufacturer will find that we are like the great American admiral—"have just begun to fight." [Applause on both sides.]

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. TINCHER. I also yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. While I am in hearty sympathy with the object and purpose of this bill, I fear in its present form it contains some provisions which I regard not only as objectionable, but if not eliminated will destroy it entirely. I refer to the postal provisions of section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for any person to deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication, any offer to make or execute, or any confirmation of the execution of, or any quotation or report of the price of, any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States, or for any person to make or execute such contract of sale, which is or may be used for (a) hedging any transaction in interstate commerce in grain or the products or by-products thereof, or (b) determining the price basis of any such transaction in interstate commerce, or (c) delivering grain sold, shipped, or received in interstate commerce for the fulfillment thereof, except—

(a) Where the seller is at the time of the making of such contract the owner of the actual physical property covered thereby, or is the grower thereof, or in case either party to the contract is the owner or renter of land on which the same is to be grown, or is an association of such owners or growers of grain, or of such owners or renters of land; or

(b) Where such contract is made by or through a member of a board of trade which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a "contract market," as hereinafter provided, and if such contract is evidenced by a memorandum in writing which shows the date, the parties to such contract and their addresses, the property covered and its price, and the terms of delivery.

These provisions are so drastic as to be indefensible, without regard to the question of constitutionality, that we should hesitate to enact them. The mere depositing in the mail, either by a person innocent of any knowledge of the matter mailed or any intent to violate the law, is made a crime; likewise as to depositing for transmission communications to be carried in interstate commerce by telegraph, and so forth. But there is good reason to believe that these provisions will be held to be unconstitutional, and as a result the whole bill, if enacted, will fail.

In order to appreciate this we should recall that the original "Tincher Act" was declared unconstitutional because it contained nothing to indicate that future trading on the grain exchanges was either interstate commerce "or directly interfering with it so as to be an obstruction or burden thereon," and was consequently a matter wholly under State control, and that the provision taxing the grain involved in the transaction 20 cents a bushel, unless the grain exchanges submitted to control and regulation by the Secretary of Agriculture, was an attempt by means of the taxing power to regulate a matter outside of the power of Congress. For this reason the act was held unconstitutional and void. The court cited several cases in support of the principle involved, among these the last child-labor case, Bailey against The Drexel Furniture Co., decided in October, 1921, where a law taxing a manufacturer 10 per cent of the earnings of his factory where there were children under certain ages employed. The act was held void because it was on its face not a tax but a penalty for failure to comply with regulations of Congress concerning a subject within the police power of the State. It also cited the first child-labor case, Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251), where the product of a factory employing child labor contrary to the provisions of the act of Congress, was prohibited from being transported or carried in interstate commerce. This was also held void on the ground that Congress could not by this exclusion of a common article of commerce accomplish the regulation of a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of the State.

The use of the taxing power and the power over transportation in interstate commerce to accomplish this illegal purpose of indirectly controlling State matters having failed, it is now proposed to invoke the postal power for the same purpose. Can this be constitutionally done? Is there any difference in principle between employing the latter power and employing the taxing power or the commerce power? Is the power of Congress any more unlimited over the one subject than over the other? Is there any reason to believe that if control of child labor in the States had been sought by means of denying the use of the mails to the employer unless he complied, or that if the original Tincher bill had invoked the postal power, as is now done in this bill, that the result of the Supreme Court decision would have been different than it was? No; but that is not all. The quoted section goes further and excludes communications as to future trading in grain from interstate commerce, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication. It completely isolates such matter from being communicated in any manner.

This is the most drastic legislation that has ever been proposed; this provision was never submitted to the Post Office Department, nor was it discussed at the hearings; it is not mentioned in the report on the bill.

The idea that the postal power of Congress is without limit has no foundation in the language of the decisions of the Supreme Court. In Ex parte Jackson (96 U. S. 727–732), involving the lottery law, the court, among other things, said, "The statute has its sanction in the power of the United States by legislation to designate what may be carried in the mails and what must be excluded therefrom, such designation and exclusion to be, however, consistent with the rights of the people as reserved in the Constitution." In the case of School of Magnetic Healing v. McNulty (187 U. S. 94) the court laid down the rule that the right to the use of the mail was a valuable and vested property right of which a man could not be deprived except by due process of law. Another rule laid down by the court is that legislation excluding from the mail must apply directly to things mailed and not to the persons using the mails. To deny the mailing privilege to one and permit it to another arbitrarily would infringe the constitutional right to due process of law and the equal protection of the law. This rule is violated in the present bill, because the exception, on page 5, permits the use of the mail for this kind of communication (a) where he is the owner of the actual physical property or is the grower thereof, (b) or in cases where the contract is made by or through a member of a board of trade which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a "contract market," and if such contract is evidenced by a memorandum in writing which shows the date, the parties to such contract and their addresses, the property covered and its price, and the terms of delivery.

Under this, John Doe, who mails a newspaper containing quotations of the price of grain futures, is guilty, but Richard Roe, who does the same thing, is not guilty because he is a member of a board of trade that is a contract market, or the owner of grain to be sold, or a farmer who produces such grain, and so forth. There is hardly a newspaper published that does not contain future grain market quotations, and the publishers who mail them under this law are all guilty and liable to $10,000 fine and a year's imprisonment for each separate mailing, unless such publisher belonged to the board of trade designated as a contract market. It is unthinkable that such legislation would be held constitutional.

THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

This bill proposes to exclude all communications relative to future trading in grain not only from the mail but from all other means of transportation in interstate commerce. In the case of In re Jackson, above cited, it was contended that the exclusion of printed matter such as newspapers containing lottery advertisements was an infringement of the right to the freedom of the press, but the court held that the newspaper could still be circulated by private conveyances and enjoy constitutional freedom without going into the mail; but it went on to say that Congress had no power to exclude transportation of such matter in other ways than by mail:

Nor can any regulations be enforced against the transportation of printed matter in the mail which is open to examination so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation the publication would be of little value. If, therefore, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way can not be forbidden by Congress. (In re Jackson, 96 U. S.)

Section 4 of the act under consideration applies to all communications, including newspapers, and it would be unlawful to deposit a paper containing "any quotation or report of the price of, any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States." There is hardly a newspaper that does not carry market quotations, and these are all excluded not only from the mail but from every other means of communication and transportation, and if this section is allowed to remain in the bill it is unquestionably unconstitutional.

The bill itself recites sufficient facts to show that the future trading in grain if not in itself interstate commerce so burdens and affects interstate commerce as to be a proper subject for regulation by Congress. Sections 1 and 2 clearly show the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction. The case of Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S.), which is cited in the opinion of the court, involving the first Tincher Act, uses this language:

That sales for future delivery on the board of trade are not in and of themselves interstate commerce. They can not come within the regulatory power of Congress as such unless they are regarded by Congress from the evidence before it as directly interfering with interstate commerce so as to be an obstruction or a burden thereon.

In view of this, what is the use of burdening this bill with these arbitrary provisions excluding matter from the mail and from interstate transportation and communication? The only object seems to me can be to render the bill unconstitutional. It is, therefore, as a friend of the bill and of the object and purpose thereof that I advocate the elimination of these provisions, and I shall at the proper time offer appropriate amendments to that effect.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, I am heartily in favor of the object and purpose of this bill. I voted for the former Capper-Tincher bill, or the Tincher bill, because I thought possibly it might be constitutional, because up to that time the use of the taxing power to get indirect control of matters within the State jurisdiction had not been declared unconstitutional.

Now, there are these three powers by the Constitution: The taxing power, the control of interstate commerce, and the third is the postal power.. The latter grant is contained in these words:

Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads.

This law provides that it shall be unlawful, subject to a $10,000 fine, for depositing in the mail any communication giving the price or quotation of a board of trade. Well, there is not a newspaper printed in the United States, hardly, that does not contain market quotations, and if you deposit that paper in the mails you are violating this law. These postal provisions in section 4 were never considered by the committee. I have the hearings here, and the only explanation given by Mr. Morrill was that he inserted the postal provisions in the same place where he formerly had the tax provisions.

There was no discussion. It was never referred to the Post Office Department or to anybody that knew anything about postal affairs. There are a hundred or more millions of people who use the mails every day of their lives, and this makes it a crime to deposit these things with reference to grains and prices, whether the person mailing them knows what they are or not. It says:

It shall be unlawful for any person to deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication, any offer to make or execute, or any confirmation of the execution of, or any quotation or report of the price of, any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States.

Why, this law will endanger the people in every part of the country of all ages. Everybody uses the mail. It is the most important element in our civilization. It is the very nerve of social and economic life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. If you eliminate this postal provision, your law may be constitutional, because you declare there that future trading in grain is affected with a public interest, and as conducted is a burden and hindrance on interstate commerce. That declaration, if true, gives jurisdiction to Congress. This was decided in the Stockyards case. Why, then, lug in the postal clause? Is it to render the act void? It would seem so. The enemies of this legislation are against my amendments. They want the bill, if passed, to be again declared void by the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I am giving the same earnest support to this bill that I gave to the former Capper-Tincher bill, now ineffective by reason of the recent Supreme Court decision. I do not favor but strongly oppose governmental interference with the honest conduct of legitimate business. But, on the other hand, I am also strongly opposed to the exercise by anyone, whether an individual, a corporation, or an association, of practices in business and trade which restrict the free operation of the law of supply and demand; of practices which introduce and perpetuate the elements of violent fluctuation and instability into the markets. I do not believe, of course, and therefore do not maintain, that the speculative feature of the market as exercised in dealing in fictitious futures can be or ever has been exercised entirely independently of and without reference to the actual world supply of and world demand for grain. But I have always believed and I here maintain, as I have stated, that the practice referred to of dealing in fictitious futures is a pernicious practice; that it is a species of gambling; that it is detrimental to the interests of both the producer and the consumer; that it is within itself commercial immorality, and it therefore violates the spirit of the law of honesty in business.

It is repugnant to any fair conception of legitimate business ethics that the price of bread, which is the staff of life, an absolute necessity to everyone, should be subjected to the caprice of those who would bull up the price or of those who would bear it down as alternating advantage gave them temporary control over the market.

I believe that the operation of this bill we are now considering, if it shall become a law, will add greatly to the stability of the American grain market and will confer a great benefit upon both the producer and the consumer and will improve the standard of the ethics of American business. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GERNERD], a member of the committee.

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with a great deal of interest to my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in his very exhaustive speech on this subject, but I felt the very remarks he was making, the very things he was saying, were strong arguments in favor of this bill. The question of false crop reports that have been given out from time to time have been the means of more losses in the grain market to the producers than any other means that have been used in this country, and that is one of the very things that this bill intends to correct. Where anyone connected with an exchange knowingly—I do not care whether it is done maliciously or willfully—sends out information that he knows is not accurate, but is intended to deceive and mislead and create a false stimulation in the market, it is wrong, and there ought to be somebody for that reason under whose control the stock exchanges should be placed, and there is no other instrumentality in this country that can control that situation better than the Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.]

Now, when it comes to the regulation of grades and weighing facilities, and all the questions entering into the selling of grain, why should they not be under the control and regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture? I wish to say that this committee went into this subject most exhaustively when the matter was originally considered, and that this last time it was only intended to meet the objections of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am sure that this bill meets them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Was it to avoid and to meet the objections of the Supreme Court of the United States that you put in all the new provisions?

Mr. GERNERD. We put in the other provisions at the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture, which had been giving this matter practical consideration.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And that is the only reason why you put them in, is it not? You did not consider them, did you?

Mr. GERNERD. What better opinion can you get than that of your Department of Agriculture? They gathered all the information.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You did not have any independent information?

Mr. GERNERD. The gentleman would not impugn this committee by saying that the members of it are automatons?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I say that you did not consider them in the committee.

Mr. GERNERD. Yes; we did.

Mr. DOWELL. Was it not to comply with the experience of the department that you put on the amendments?

Mr. GERNERD. That is the very reason. I, for one, though coming from a Middle Eastern State, represent one of the largest States in agriculture in the country. I think we are sixth. And I want to ask you why should the prices in Chicago change three or four or five times a day through misrepresentation and fraudulent dealings and deprive the farmers of my district of that price for their wheat to which they are justly entitled? Let's have square dealing. Fraudulent manipulation in the food products of the country must cease. This bill will help to cure this very evil.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, for more than a quarter of a century the grain exchanges of the country have been subjected to the severest criticism. Many efforts have been made to pass laws to correct the evils complained of, but for some reason or other none were ever passed.

Each time sentiment began crystallizing in favor of legislation it was destroyed by the most vigorous opposition, and every attempt to legislate was frustrated. One can readily appreciate how powerful these influences are when one realizes that practically all of the grain products of the country are sold through five or six grain exchanges. It is in these exchanges that the price of wheat, corn, oats, and rye are made and where the demand is stimulated or depressed.

The farmer's market for his grain products is therefore restricted to these few exchanges, and naturally there arises a great hesitancy to do anything that might hinder or destroy his only markets. He is unorganized and must content himself with the price that is created there; but the many fluctuations in prices have created much distrust and unrest and there has sprung forth a deep-seated suspicion that the farmer is not getting an adequate price for his grain. One can not help but share this belief when the colossal volume of trading that is done upon these exchanges and the manner in which that business is transacted is considered and analyzed. It is stated that on the Chicago Board of Trade alone 90,000,000,000 bushels of grain are sold in a single year, when in reality our total production that year may have been but 900,000,000 bushels. In other words, that grain is sold over and over again, until, as appears, it has been sold and resold a hundred times. This is accomplished by future trading by men who are constantly buying and selling grain, who never intend in reality to purchase a single bushel of grain. They are pure speculators. A few years ago a number of prominent traders on the Chicago Board of Trade testified before a competent judicial tribunal that they never in their transactions expect to have actual deliveries of grain made to them in their purchases. One of them stated that his firm did a business of 600,000 bushels a day and that not more than 1 per cent resulted in actual delivery. Another testified that he had done a business of 100,000,000 annually for 15 years, and that only two or three times in all his experience had he had grain delivered to him during this period, and then not in excess of 200,000 bushels. Many other traders related the same experience.

In recent years the average annual receipts of wheat at Chicago have not exceeded 50,000,000 bushels, and yet the sales of wheat in Chicago on the Board of Trade may have been a hundred times that amount. As the result of such a system there has grown up the most gigantic gambling system that the world has ever known. All over this country there are thousands of persons who daily buy and sell grain upon the grain exchanges who never intend to become the buyers of an actual bushel of grain. The persons who engage in this character of business are shrewd, hazardous, and resourceful individuals who by their cunning devise every possible trick to win in the great game they are playing. They buy or sell grain for future delivery on the chance of a favorable change in the market before the day specified for delivery in their contract. Instead of delivering the actual grain, a dealer makes settlement of his contract in paying the differences in the market price which are called and known as margins. In other words, to use a common expression, he simply bets upon what the future price of grain is going to be. A practice resorted to by the controlling members of the leading grain exchanges is by concerted action to withdraw enormous quantities of wheat from the public warehouses and terminal elevators and by combined bidding in the put on futures depress or raise the price of wheat to suit the purposes of their gambling operations.

Through such combinations and manipulations the prices are depressed during a period when the farmer is compelled to market the greater portion of his crop, and then after they have secured control of the crop within their combine they reverse their tactics and begin to stimulate and tempt the purely speculative buyer. Another familiar trick to break the price in the market is the offering for sale of unusually large quantities of grain and persisting therein until after the price is broken, after which they reverse their attitude by violent buying. One of the most vicious practices indulged in by those who trade in puts and calls is that which permits these speculators after the close of the market to purchase options upon these grain exchanges to sell or buy the next day at the opening of the market a given quantity of grain.

It is surprising what remote factors affect the fluctuations of the price of grain upon these grain exchanges. The death of a foreign sovereign or of the President of the United States, the report of a drought or a flood, a public catastrophe, a threatened strike, or the enactment of legislation, or some decision of the Supreme Court upon a vital public question—all unrelated to the natural supply or demand of grain products—are known to have materially influenced the prices on the market.

In view of these facts it is not surprising that many efforts have been attempted in the past to cure this great national evil, but for more than 50 years this gigantic system of speculating in the food products of the Nation has been persisted in, to the great detriment of the farmer and the consumer. No institution that is based upon pure gambling, however powerful it may be, can successfully endure. During the World War there was no future trading in wheat, for the reason that the price of wheat was fixed and under governmental control. As the result of this experience an irresistible demand developed throughout the country that these great grain exchanges be regulated and placed under governmental supervision. That desire is being met by this bill, which is but the beginning of an evolution that can not fail to reveal the actual practices that are now indulged in by these grain exchanges and which we are confident will bring about such reforms as the circumstances will present, and thereby protect the American Republic against a great unnatural blight. While this bill was being considered by the Committee on Agriculture many of the leading men of the Nation, as well as officials of the grain exchanges, appeared before us and their views and experiences were sought and obtained.

It was but natural that they would defend the great speculative system of the exchanges. They insisted that future trading was absolutely essential, and that to restrict the trading to a cash market would destroy the present marketing system of the Nation and bring about a national crisis. They contended that trading in futures was but a form of insurance which protected the seller of grain for future delivery against fluctuations in price between the time of sale and the actual delivery of the wheat. It appears that a very novel system has developed on the grain exchanges which has become general in practice. It is known as hedging. One of the witnesses before the committee explained it as follows: Having bet on one side he immediately proceeds to bet on the other side, and in this way protects himself against a loss. As a practical illustration daily engaged in, a farmer sells 5,000 bushels of wheat for future delivery at a certain destination at a given time, say 30 days.

In order to avoid the danger of failure to make the delivery, due to railroad congestion, strikes, or other unforeseen causes during which time the price of wheat may drop 15 cents per bushel, he proceeds to protect himself against this possible fluctuation in the market by wiring some commission house that is a member of a grain exchange to sell for him 5,000 bushels of wheat for future delivery. After he has done this he has secured himself against a possible loss during the period between the sale and the delivery of the wheat.

When the time for delivery arrives he pays his margin. By this method he has hedged his wheat against a possible drop in price. It would appear that the difference between hedging and future trading consists in the fact that the hedge is based upon grain actually in existence or contracted for in a legitimate manner, whereas in future trading grain is but a phantom commodity used as a means to further the gambling transaction. Another apt illustration of how a hedge is used to-day in the grain exchanges is the illustration of a Duluth miller who has received an order for 5,000 barrels of flour to be delivered next July at a given price. The price of the flour is based upon the prevailing market price of wheat. The miller, however, does not know what the price will be next July. He finds it impractical to buy wheat and store it until he needs it in July, nor does he care to take the risk of the price of wheat going up or down between the time he accepted the order for the flour and the day of delivery in July. Therefore, in order to protect himself against variations in price, the day he accepts the order for 5,000 barrels of flour he goes into the grain market and buys 25,000 bushels of wheat for delivery in July. By doing this the Duluth miller has hedged his sale of 5,000 barrels of flour, and it matters not to him after that whether the price of wheat goes up or down. He is protected. All the expense to him for this protection is the margin that he is required to pay at the time he closes his contract on the grain exchange.

It is conceded by all practical men in the grain business that hedging to-day is a necessity as terminal marketing of grain products is now conducted, and it is only through these channels that the actual grain is distributed. But it is an absurdity to say in order to insure or protect the hedging system that 100 future contracts must be made in order to insure 1 bushel of wheat, or, in other words, that the entire grain crop of the Nation must be sold a hundred times on the grain exchanges in order to insure the safety of the hedge. It seems incredible that the economic law of supply and demand could have any influence upon a market like this, where grain is but the symbol around which the most fantastic lottery of all time has been built up. This wild, excessive, and unrestricted future trading in the basic necessities of life must be bridled under the firm reins of the Government. A business of such stupendous importance, that fails to record the millions of transactions made upon the market and which in no way discloses the identity of the parties involved in the trading, needs to be reformed and brought within the light of day. Manipulations of the market must be stopped and the character of business upon the grain exchanges made to conform with the highest degree of business ethics.

This bill that we now are considering does not seek to destroy or even to disturb the legitimate methods of trading upon the grain exchanges, but it does hope to purge them of the flagrant practices that have grown to be such a disturbing menace to the farmers of the Nation. The country, as a whole, is vitally interested in this great problem, and I confidently hope that the day may not be far distant when every form of gambling in our food products will disappear, and that the law of supply and demand may have its natural course. The farmer who produces the food for the Nation constantly faces the conflicting elements of nature, but his indomitable spirit finds him content with what Providence has rewarded his labor. But after he has harvested his crop, which the gentle rains and the warmth of the sun have ripened into golden grain, then he most certainly should not be victimized by a great army of gambling parasites who neither produce or wish to permit the producer to live. I believe this bill known as the Tincher-Capper bill marks the beginning of a new era which will introduce into the great grain exchanges of the world the eternal maxim, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, everyone should be interested in those who are engaged in agriculture. All of us are consumers, and of necessity we are concerned in those things that affect the producers.

This bill is designed to prevent gambling in grain and is an honest attempt to stabilize the grain market. It seems to me that it is fundamentally and economically unsound to permit gambling in grain futures. This bill seeks to prevent that, but to permit legitimate exchanges.

This is but one of several bills that have been passed by the Congress in an effort to encourage agriculture. Some of those already passed are the emergency tariff, the cooperative marketing bill, legislation to regulate the packing industry, a bill that will permit the appointment by the President of a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board, an act liberalizing the War Finance Corporation, the extension of the farm loan act, and the filled milk bill.

Sheep raising and woolgrowing are carried on extensively in my district and in the country. The woolgrower, and I believe the people in general, are interested in the truth in fabric bill, and I think it ought to be brought before the Congress for consideration and enacted into law. The general tariff bill was passed by the House last July and is now being considered in the Senate. Time will not permit a review of all the legislation that has been enacted by this Congress. It seems to me there is an awakened interest on the part of our citizenship in our Government. The men have been responsible for government, but now that the women have the right of suffrage they are manifesting a lively interest in governmental affairs, and this Congress has enacted much legislation that was favored by the womanhood of the country.

The problem of government to-day is complex and seems to become increasingly difficult. Either directly or indirectly, everyone helps in paying our taxes and is therefore interested in economy and the proper expenditure of our funds.

When we stop to think that the expenditures of the Government were about $1,250,000,000 in 1916 and $19,000,000,000 in 1919, we can somewhat appreciate the burden we are carrying.

In 1920 we spent approximately $6,150,000,000; in 1921, $5,500,000,000; in 1922, $3,947,000,000, and for the fiscal year 1923, we expect to reduce our expenditures to $3,650,000,000.

In the revenue bill that we passed in this Congress, it is estimated we reduced the taxes $818,000,000 for the calendar year 1922, and eliminated some of the obnoxious taxes.

The Budget system authorized by this Congress and installed by this administration will mean a great saving and for the first time put the Government on a business basis.

In the bills for the Army and the Navy lately passed, the size of the Army will be 125,000 and the personnel of the Navy 86,000. We have appropriated for the Army $63,500,000 less than last year and reduced the appropriation for the Navy, as compared with last year, $124,000,000.

The Congress has authorized the "scrapping" of the vessels as provided in the treaty which grew out of the conference which was authorized by Congress, called by President Harding, and presided over by Secretary Hughes. We believe this conference a great step forward and a distinct advancement toward the peace of the world.

Many as are our problems, we can solve them if we bring to their solution patience, intelligence, and a patriotic purpose to master them in a legal and constitutional way. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say as a member of the Committee on Agriculture that I helped report this bill out, and that I am very much in favor of it, as I am in favor of the bill in regard to fabrics. [Applause.] This bill (H. R. 11843) is to correct the grain futures act in its defects wherein the United States Supreme Court declared our former act unconstitutional. The former law functioned until May 15, and the Agricultural Department was operating under the law. During the time the law was in force there appeared to be less manipulation of the grain market than at any time in the history of our Government. The present bill is so drawn that it is believed it will stand the acid test of the Supreme Court.

I believe there is only one class arrayed against this legislation, and that is the gambling class. The producer and the consumer will be, in my opinion, the beneficiaries under this bill as now drawn and proposed to be reenacted. Hence I support it.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT]. [Applause.]

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin want a quorum?

Mr. VOIGT. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I withdraw my point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this bill, as it comes from the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member. It is not necessary for me to make a lengthy speech at this time, as I expressed myself quite fully on the subject matter of this bill when it was before us in another form last year. (See RECORD of May 16, 1921, p. 1475.) The law which was passed last year was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in May, 1922. That law was drawn under the taxing power of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court has declared that Congress can not regulate under the guise of the taxing power. Most of that law was swept away by the decision, the only portions remaining being a clause taxing so-called puts and calls 20 cents per bushel and giving the Secretary of Agriculture the right to call for certain information and to investigate. The committee has now brought in a bill which is very similar to the law passed last year, and this time we have endeavored to make it constitutional by invoking the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

The bill before us can hardly be called a perfect piece of legislation. It was drawn and considered rather hurriedly, so that it might pass the House at this session. But whatever its defects may prove to be, I feel that the House is justified in passing it now, as we must do something to check manipulation and gambling in the food products of the country. Since the law was declared unconstitutional last month, the price of wheat has dropped over 40 cents a bushel. We do not know what has caused this drop, but the farmer has a right to be suspicious, and he has a right to demand that supervisory power over the grain exchanges be vested somewhere so that the light may be turned on the transactions on grain exchanges, and he be assured of a square deal. This is pioneer legislation, and only time can tell what changes in it will be necessary so that its purpose may be accomplished.

There should be no gambling in the food products of the country. We are all agreed on that. It frequently results in harm to both producer and consumer. Some people go so far as to demand that all grain exchanges be closed. In my judgment such a step would be in the wrong direction. The farmer and consumer need all the marketing facilities we have. What we need are more, and not less, marketing facilities. What we are after is a proper regulation of our markets so that the public will have confidence in them. The greatest economic problem before the American people to-day is this one of marketing. The loss or spread between producer and consumer is appalling. It is estimated that for every dollar the ultimate consumer pays the farmer receives about 35 cents. If this spread can be reduced it will mean billions to the American people every year. My belief is that the first steps must be taken by the farmers themselves. They must form cooperative marketing associations. They must build warehouses, and the States and the Federal Government must assist them, so that they can supply their products to the markets as they are needed. The Government should assist to the fullest extent possible, but, after all, it is a case of God helping those who help themselves.

Until we have a system of cooperative marketing it is an absolute impossibility to stop all gambling in grain. This bill will reduce the gambling, but we can not stop it altogether without hurting both consumer and producer. We have therefore adopted a middle course and have provided for supervision and regulation of the whole grain-selling machinery. Our committee has studied this subject very fully; we have had before us the leading men in the country in the grain business—the Secretary of Agriculture and some of his assistants and men who represent the farmers—and we have all come to the conclusion that in order to stop all gambling we must do away with the so-called "hedge" in the grain trade, which operates for the protection of producer and consumer. If we do this we increase the spread between producer and consumer and injure both. If I knew of a way under our present system to stop the gambling, I should be very glad to help report out such a bill. [Applause.]

This bill, to a man who has not studied it, is quite a complicated affair and quite lengthy. There are two valuable features in it: One is that it will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to demand reports of transactions in grain from grain exchanges and their members. That is a very valuable feature, because it will enable the Secretary to publish facts and figures from time to time and keep the public informed as to the manner in which the business is conducted. The other is that which enables him to stop manipulation. History shows that men with very large means, and combinations of men, can and have influenced grain prices to the detriment of the public. Whenever the Secretary suspects that such manipulation is going on he can call for reports, and if the transactions appear to be unusual he can give the information to the country, and the manipulators will fail, because they can not get people to buy or sell on their terms.

There are other features in the bill, such as supervision over inspection and weighing and provisions against the sending out of false or misleading market news; but the two features I have mentioned are in my judgment the most valuable and fully justify this legislation.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This bill from its title is to prevent and remove burdens upon Interstate Commerce by regulating certain transactions on certain grain exchanges.

This is the greatest grain-producing country of the world. This country should always be interested in agriculture and the man who produces the products of the farm. This Congress has repeatedly manifested its interest in agriculture. And where those measures have been wise and in the general interests of the whole country the people in both city and country have expressed their approval of such legislation. The welfare of the country and that of the producer and grower of grain is most closely related. The welfare of the manufacturer in the city is closely wrapped up with the welfare of the grain grower. The success of the one is dependent upon the success of the other.

I come from a city district, and yet, as one representing not only that district but the country as a whole, I say that if there is any practice which obstructs or unduly restricts the flow of grain in interstate commerce it should be prohibited, whether that practice is done by the grain grower or the grain dealer.

For my own part, and from an examination of the hearings, I deny that there is any evidence of such obstruction before the Committee on Agriculture. However, a majority of the members of that committee have thought otherwise, and they have reported this bill to the House for our consideration and deliberation. It is our duty to perfect it in every reasonable way. That shall be my attitude.

There is a difference of opinion as to the function of a grain exchange and whether or not they perform a useful purpose. There is one group in the House who feel that they should be abolished and that all trading in grain futures should be done away with. This group is composed largely if not exclusively of those Members who have given very little thought or consideration to a very technical but yet most important question. There is another group who in large part are graduates from this first group. They have received some light on the subject. They are convinced that their original judgment was wrong. However, they want to satisfy the farmer on the one hand and satisfy their judgment on the other. This group supported the previous bill which has been declared unconstitutional, and it is this group that is back of the present bill.

Then there is the third group who feel that from time to time there may be need of regulation by State or Federal Governments, but who feel that such regulation should be drawn so as to regulate abuses if there are such, but not under guise of regulation prohibit the workings of an intricate marketing and distributing business which is so vitally wrapped up with the welfare of both grain grower and grain consumer. For myself, I belong to this latter group.

Mr. Chairman, we must bear in mind that our present system of distributing and marketing the grain of this country has been years in building. Whatever its faults, under it the producer has a market. He can go to the bank at any time and borrow money on a margin close up to the market price. This is due to the system of insurance called hedging. There can be no hedging without a futures market. Deprive the buyer of grain of his right to hedge, or insure, and he must do business on a much wider margin. To any thinking man this means less money to the grain grower. The system is technical and intricate. Few people can understand it in detail, and therefore it offers a ready opportunity to the politician seeking votes from a farming constituency. Like everyone else who has something to sell, the farmer wants the best possible price for his produce. No one can blame him for it. When the market goes down he is disappointed. When it goes up he is elated and wonders why it did not go up before. It is not a difficult task, therefore, to advise the farmer that this decrease or increase, as the case may be, is due to manipulation by grain dealers upon the various grain exchanges. Hence the desire upon the part of misinformed producers—and their number is growing less—for the abolishment of the grain exchange and the doing away with grain futures.

In a great world commodity like wheat there are innumerable factors that affect the price. Reports may come in of a drought in a great wheat-producing section. Immediately this is reflected in the market. Then comes another report of conditions which may possibly lead to war and a consequent increased demand for wheat from the countries affected. Immediately the market responds. I could cite dozens of instances where the market would be affected one way or the other.

It has been claimed here by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] that the price of grain has been manipulated since the 15th day of May, to the detriment of the farmer. Wheat went up 4 cents following the decision of the Supreme Court holding a vital portion of the future trading act unconstitutional. Did the announcement of this decision cause this rise? Certainly not. Wheat has been going down since May 31, when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] introduced this bill into the House. Did his introduction of this bill depress the market? I can hardly think that it did. The truth is that there are so many factors which affect the market that we can not ascribe its fluctuations to any one cause.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] calls attention to the depreciation in the futures market since the annulment of the futures trading act. Let me call attention to the cash market. This bill would in no way directly affect the cash market. The cash market on No. 1 northern on January 3 of this year was $1.33.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I should like about half a minute more.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. TINCHER. The time for debate is fixed by the rule.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Cash wheat was $1.334 on the 2d of January. On the 15th of May, when this decision of the Supreme Court was announced, it had gone up to $1.73. In other words, the future market that has been talked about here merely followed the cash market, being above it because of the premium.

From the 15th of May until the 19th of June—the last date for which figures are available—the cash market went down from $1.73 to $1.50. Now, can that be ascribed to this bill or to any bill at all? Certainly not. Other factors entered into it. I challenge anyone to tell which is the controlling factor. Yet the chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. TINCHER], comes before the House here and tells you that it is manipulation caused by the failure of his other bill which is the cause of this fluctuation and this decline in prices. He seems to be the only one willing to make that statement.

To get back to our marketing system let me say this: That whether we agree or disagree we must agree on this that it is our present system for marketing grain. Whether it has faults or virtues, it has taken years to establish it, and it is our only method of distribution. Gentlemen, we should well hesitate under these circumstances and conditions in the handling of this technical and intricate business before we tinker and tamper with it. It is a means of distributing hundreds of millions of dollars worth of produce every year, and we ought not to rush in blindly to legislate upon it. We ought not to destroy the present system without establishing another. All of this should call for legislation following deliberation, rather than legislation following mere agitation.

How much deliberation, Mr. Chairman, has there been given this bill since its inception?

Some months ago this Congress passed the futures trading act, which taxed grain futures for regulatory purposes. In the case of Hill against Wallace on May 15 the Supreme Court of the United States held a vital portion of the law unconstitutional as an invalid exercise by Congress of the taxing power. The present bill seeking to regulate under the interstate commerce clause was introduced in the House 15 days afterwards. In its essential features this bill is radically different. It was referred to the Committee on Agriculture who spent four days only in considering it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Four half days.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman from Illinois is correct; it was but four half days. Mind you, as I shall show, this bill involves the consideration of several grave constitutional questions. It was then reported to the House, and judging from the minority report the Committee on Agriculture did not even take the time to read the bill in its entirety. But eight out of sixteen pages were read by the committee. Think of it. A committee not reading its own bill. One can not doubt this statement in the minority report of extreme and undue haste in considering this bill when certain portions are read. Some of its provisions simply can not be understood.

In enacting the future trading act based upon the taxing power of Congress this same committee spent weeks in its deliberation. And yet with this care or apparent care it reported out an unconstitutional bill.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Of course, to be entirely fair it should be understood that the entire act was not declared to be unconstitutional, and the gentleman recognizes the fact that in remedying the defect which appeared to the court in section 4 we have at least attempted to make a bill that will pass the courts.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I realize that the gentleman from Indiana, for whom I have the highest regard, is perfectly sincere in believing that out of this will come something that will pass the Supreme Court. But the fact remains that for all practical purposes the Supreme Court annulled the original futures trading act. And the action of the committee in drawing up this bill indicates that they understand that this bill if it becomes a law will for all practical purposes displace the original act.

In the brief hearings that were allowed by this committee several perfectly apparent defects were pointed out by witnesses appearing before the committee. All of these suggestions have been disregarded. The work of the draftsman from the Department of Agriculture must go through unchanged. Apparently those in charge of the bill have such little confidence in their own understanding of the subject matter as to be afraid of any and all changes, even those involving grammar. Speed, for some reason or other, seems imperative. Not only was there undue haste in the consideration of this bill in committee, but immediately following its report to the House it is presented to us in the closing days of the session under a special rule limiting general debate to but one hour on a side. It must be borne in mind that some of the States of the Union already have regulatory laws pertaining to the same subject matter. They have proceeded upon the theory that in so doing they were properly exercising jurisdiction over contracts made within the State which are intrastate in character. Yet it is proposed here to annul these State laws and to embark upon this legislation with practically no deliberation in committee and with but three or four hours' deliberation in the House.

Mr. Chairman, there has been some criticism of Congress of late. Some of it has come from sources wholly unexpected. Personally I have joined in a feeling of resentment at the expression of some of that criticism. However, we must bear in mind that if we are to keep Congress free from this criticism we must see to it ourselves that it remains what its founders expected it to remain, and that is a deliberative body. A deliberative body first gets the facts, informs itself on the fundamental law and existing law, and then by wise counsel and deliberation enacts new legislation. This is not being done in this particular case. The entire proceedings negative deliberation.

We should always prevent Congress from being the mouthpiece of a vociferous minority in the country, made so by a campaign of misrepresentation and prejudice by unprincipled agitators. The passing of the legislative "buck" by Congress to the Supreme Court belittles Congress and does an injustice to the court and should not be tolerated.

In brief, the bill before us prohibits a delivery through the mails or in interstate commerce, by wire or wireless, of any offer, confirmation of offer, or quotation of price of any contract for future delivery, except as to the actual owner or grower of the physical property, or where it is made by a member of a grain exchange which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a contract market.

I want to call the attention of the Members to the wording of section 2 defining interstate commerce. Apparently it has been bodily taken from the packers' control act without regard to its application to the subject matter of this legislation.

Then I want to call attention to the provisions of section 3. The recital of these facts, which, by the way, are not borne out by the testimony, is certainly novel, to say the least. Think of establishing facts by legislative enactment. Yet that is just what this bill seeks to do in section 3.

It will be observed that section 4 does not make a futures contract or quotation unlawful in itself, but it makes it unlawful for any person, except under conditions, to deliver such for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce channels. This section, in my judgment, is clearly unconstitutional. Congress has the power to regulate commerce between the States, but not to prohibit it. This has been repeatedly held. The power to prohibit is only as to those transactions which are immoral, or which are in themselves harmful to the public health, and so forth.

The provision in subdivision (a) in section 4 is an arbitrary classification and discriminatory and is of doubtful constitutionality.

Provision is then made authorizing the Secretary to designate certain exchanges as contract markets under certain conditions. I shall have more to say about that when that particular section comes up for discussion under the five-minute rule. At this time let me merely call attention to the crude wording in subdivision (f) of section 5. This is merely another instance of the result of haste and lack of deliberation.

I shall also refer to this later, but call attention to a penal statute with a fine of $10,000 or one year imprisonment, or both, for carelessness in delivering through the channels of interstate commerce misleading or inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information that affect the price of grain. This is certainly an oddity in the drafting of penal legislation.

Mr. Chairman, it may very well be that regulation is needed. If so, there should be no fear or apprehension on the part of those who seek that legislation from a careful and fair consideration of this whole question. I hope that the haste and the hurry with which this bill was considered in committee will not be repeated in the House. This bill should be sent back to the committee with instructions to deliberate upon it and to most carefully consider the constitutionality of some of its provisions. Having passed one piece of unconstitutional legislation regarding this matter, let us not now repeat the performance. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. And the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] has how much?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes also.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, it seems unfortunate at times that Congress finds itself limited by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Many of us seem to be imbued with the idea that we ought to have complete authority to legislate on any subject in any manner that we see fit. Without intending any offense whatever, I have sometimes thought that is particularly the attitude of the Committee on Agriculture. I appreciate fully the importance of the agricultural interests of the country. I have supported practically all the legislation placed before this House in the last Congress and the present Congress designed to benefit agriculture. But we must not forget the limitations of the fundamental law of the land, which prescribes the areas within which we are permitted to legislate. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] a moment ago called attention to a very important matter in connection with this bill. As he explained it, this bill no doubt runs counter to the limitations upon Congress in the matter of legislating upon postal matters. When this question was last before the House, the Committee on Agriculture thought that they could regulate the exchanges and boards of trade by a system of taxation. Since the decision of the Supreme Court, it would seem that the proper title for that bill would have been "a bill to regulate boards of trade under the pretense of raising revenue." Some of us at that time were of the opinion that the pretense of raising revenue would not bring the legislation within the limitations of the Constitution. If this bill is passed in its present form, when it comes back from its consideration by the Supreme Court it is very likely that some of us will be disposed to give it the title of "a bill to regulate boards of trade under the pretense of regulating interstate commerce."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have not much time. In fact, knowing something about some of the main purposes of those who are supporting this legislation, one might entitle this "a bill to compel boards of trade to admit to their membership representatives of cooperative associations who rebate commissions to their members, or notwithstanding that they rebate commissions to their members;" because one of the main purposes of the legislation apparently is to compel boards of trade to take into their membership the cooperative associations who insist upon rebating their commissions to their members and who would place their members upon an entirely different basis and footing than others who are admitted to membership in the boards of trade. A great deal has been said here about gambling. I think we ought to be sufficiently fair in this discussion not to use that phrase so frequently. That matter was discussed thoroughly when this bill was last considered here. The gentleman who sponsors the bill [Mr. TINCHER] tells you he believes that there must be hedging for those who deal in futures. So far as gambling is concerned, if there has been any, if you will examine the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case of Hill against Wallace, you will find that the Supreme Court distinctly sustained section 3, which is the one that places a prohibitive tax upon all "privileges, bids, offers, puts and calls, indemnities, or ups and downs." In other words, the last act which we passed has, in section 3, a prohibitive tax upon all transactions that might properly be denominated or described as gambling transactions, and those transactions no longer occur upon the boards.

As for the Secretary of Agriculture making investigations, ascertaining facts and reporting them to the country and publishing the results of his investigations, that power remains under section 9 of the old bill, because the Supreme Court states in its opinion that that section is not subject to the objection which was made to section 4.

We are not opposed to legitimate, constitutional legislation upon this subject. We are opposed to some of the provisions of this bill, and if you will read the minority views, signed only by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], although, as I am informed, other members of the committee sympathize with many of the views therein expressed, you will find in those minority views a statement of the provisions to which we are here objecting, and in the course of the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule amendments will be offered changing certain provisions of the legislation. Let us approach this thing with deliberative minds. Let us take up the consideration of this important question in a proper spirit, for it is important not only to the grain exchanges and to the boards of trade, but it is important to the producers as well as to the farmers, whose interests all of us should have at heart. Let me ask you gentlemen this question, since you are so anxious to pass legislation to regulate the boards of trade and apparently do not concern yourselves about our fears that you are going to injure the boards of trade, that you are going to drive them out of business, let me ask you this question: Where do you think the agricultural interests would stand—how do you think they would get along—if these exchanges were to close up their doors to-night and not operate for 48 hours? The exchanges could give you a very conclusive demonstration of their value if they were to take so drastic a step.

Mr. GERNERD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly.

Mr. GERNERD. Is there anything in the bill that leads the gentleman to believe that such a drastic move would be undertaken?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; fortunately the exchanges are not taking that attitude, but you gentlemen do not seem to be at all concerned about the effect of this legislation upon the exchanges. If you had spent more time than you did in consideration of the bill, you would have stopped one minute before, for instance, you accepted paragraph (f) in section 5. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the arguments of the opponents of this bill are strangely contradictory. The undisputed testimony shows that when the preceding bill was declared unconstitutional wheat went down on the Chicago Board of Trade. It also shows that on the Minneapolis exchange it did not go down. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota would be in favor of the bill when properly analyzed. The Minneapolis Board of Trade is operated under a State statute of a supervisory nature, and when the other bill that Congress passed was declared unconstitutional the Minneapolis exchange was still left subject to the State law, and wheat did not go down in price in that market. On the Chicago Board of Trade, when the act was declared unconstitutional, there was no statute left controlling that board and wheat went down 32 cents a bushel within 15 days on that board. The objection that Minneapolis people had to the bill was that it would interfere with their State regulations. It seems from the above statement that some sort of regulation would be helpful.

The gentleman who last addressed us complained of some of the positions taken by the Committee on Agriculture. I want to remind him that as far as I have been able to observe the only law that the Committee on Agriculture has reported which has been questioned by the Supreme Court, and that only in one section, is the law relating to this subject; and the suggestion was made in the opinion in that case the power might be exercised under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and that is what this bill undertakes to do. Complaint was made by the gentleman from Illinois that this measure authorized cooperative associations to become members of the board of trade.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; the gentleman misstates my position.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not yield. I do not misstate it. He complains that one purpose of the bill was to require them to admit cooperative associations to the board of trade.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. To rebate commissions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If they can operate on less money, I say the cooperative associations of this country have as much right to operate in the market on grain as the members of the Chicago Board of Trade. It seems passing strange that the board of trade that assumes to do so much for agriculture should say that "we do not want these cooperative concerns which handle the products of the farm to have a position on the board of trade."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman does not state my position.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, the gentleman lugged it in two or three times, and the House understands it, and I hope the gentleman does; that he referred to associations which rebate commissions, and practically all of them do this, either by dividend or otherwise. The cooperative association, or any other association that can operate and sell grain on a board of trade at a less expense than some other men are willing to do, should have the right; and yet you would forbid them going on the board of trade, and license a supercharge by members of the board of trade. If the cooperative association for a less commission can operate, why can not the individual; and if they can not, why not? Let the cooperative association have the privilege of operating.

Certain gentlemen have complained that the Agricultural Committee has been trying to do too much for the farmer. No such complaint was made by them of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee when it reported a measure paying the railroads hundreds of millions. No such complaint was made by them when the Ways and Means Committee undertook to erect a tariff wall that would almost destroy our foreign trade, nor the many other special interests who have been here. But when something in the way of legislation is offered for the farmer, the anvil chorus starts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think any good purpose can be served by me in rehashing all the facts surrounding the presentation of this bill to the House. I want to take this opportunity, however, to say on behalf of the Agricultural Committee, with, I trust, due modesty, that no committee in this House has been more careful in the consideration of legislation that has come before it than has our committee. I believe there is as little tendency toward radicalism in our committee as will be found in any other committee in the House. I also want to add that any suggestion or innuendo on the floor of the House or elsewhere that this bill was lightly considered or was purposely rushed through in order that it might get before the country before election is entirely preposterous. There is a book of hearings on that table covering 30 or 40 days, which is the best evidence of the fact that our committee carefully considered every single proposition that could be taken into consideration in connection with this matter. In good faith and after careful study we brought before this House and the country the bill, one section of which was recently declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. We can be excused because it was a new venture, a new proposition, this suggestion of regulating the grain exchanges by taxation.

Now, when we went back into our Agricultural Committee to rewrite the bill, I submit to any fair-minded and honest Member of this House that it was unnecessary for us to cover the entire scope of the hearings which we had thoroughly covered before. We took out section 4, which the Supreme Court declared to be unconstitutional, and substituted another provision in the bill. As a member of the Agricultural Committee I think I can speak for the other members and truthfully say that there has never at any time been a tendency or a desire on the part of any member of the committee, or the committee as a whole, to do anything to destroy this great market system of the country. We want to preserve every good feature of it, because it provides an outlet and a ready market for the products of the farms of our country. But we are anxious to, and I believe we do by this bill, prevent manipulation, a thing which the exchanges themselves want to prevent. We intend by this bill to do away, if possible, with those harmful speculatory features which result in injury not only to the producers but to the consumers. I sincerely trust that with the least possible delay, in the hope that we may yet do something for the crop being harvested throughout this country, we may pass this bill and put it on the statute books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-seven Members present, a quorum. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of "The grain futures act."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, from time to time I have heard some Democratic expressions which would seem to indicate that the Members of the minority would almost be willing to have another Republican elected from Texas, provided that he should be elected from the seventeenth district of that State. A good many Members of the majority side—in fact, I believe all but one of them would be prepared to endure with considerable fortitude the election of a Democrat from the second district of Wisconsin.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] seems to enjoy our presence rather more than we enjoy his. [Laughter.]

Friday he caused 14 roll calls of the House, consuming about 40 minutes each. His fellow Members have been very good-natured in helping him to nurse his grouch. I noticed the lovable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD], who has been sick for many months, staying with us in his wheel chair until 10 o'clock Friday night in order to make a quorum, and he has been here all day at each session since. [Applause.]

No great problem of party policy or of the country's welfare was involved in any question upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] forced a vote Friday. He was no Horatius at the bridge, defending any great principle against a tyrannical majority. Of the 9 record votes which were taken on that day, following the gentleman's points of no quorum, the largest adverse vote was 39; in no other case were there more than 3; in five cases there were no negative votes at all, and in every single instance the gentleman who insisted on the quorum himself voted with the majority.

The amendments were all on matters in which the sentiment of the House was known to be practically unanimous. At least one of them was a merely formal correction of figures, and another was to insert the word "the."

The gentleman's action is purely personal. He has evidently conceived the idea that by punishing his fellow Members and impeding the transaction of the public business he can force the House to assist him in coercing another department of the Government for the sake of helping him secure certain postmaster appointments to which he considers himself entitled.

About 230 Members have answered each quorum call prior to this day. Considering that the average Congressman works 12 hours a day seven days in the week, the working time of a Congressman is worth approximately $1.67 per hour. Each roll call takes approximately 40 minutes. Approximately 168,800 hours of the time of these Members was, therefore, consumed on Friday alone in roll calls on uncontroverted matters, at a time when every Member is just as busy as he can possibly be with the work of clearing up his constituents' business in anticipation of recess. The value of this time on that single day was $281,896, or considerably more than the annual salary of all the postmasters in the gentleman's district. Add the time of the House employees and the total will be very considerably increased.

The gentleman is still going strong to-day, and at the present rate he will soon have consumed a million dollars worth of the time of Members of the House.

Since it is impossible to explain the gentleman's conduct by the usual, orderly processes of logic, I have endeavored to put his point of view into halting verse, the only appropriate medium. I submit the following to the charitable judgment of my colleagues, not as an example of literature but as a study in psychology:

Perhaps I am not very sure
What we are voting on,
What laws we make, that may affect
The country when I'm gone;
But this I know, that I'm abused,
My patronage is shorn.

At parliament'ry law I am
A little trifle shy;
The tariff is a mystery,
The bonus all awry;
But this I know, my patronage
Must not be left to die.

The Senator who stole my pie
I can not cause to suffer,
But I can soak my colleagues here,
So let them be the buffer.
I'll treat 'em rough, and rough some more—
And then I'll treat 'em rougher.

George Washington, and Lincoln, too,
Foiled national disaster,
And hardly ever even squawked
That Congress moved no faster;
But, then, they only saved the flag—
I'm saving a postmaster.

There is a place, far, far away,
I need not tell you where,
Where only one thing's lacking,
Besides the chaplain's prayer.
When I arrive 'twill be complete,
There'll be a quorum there.

[Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "That this" and insert in lieu thereof the word "This."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) That for the purposes of this act "contract of sale" shall be held to include sales, agreements of sale, and agreements to sell. That the word "person" shall be construed to import the plural or singular, and shall include individuals, associations, partnerships, corporations, and trusts. That the word "grain" shall be construed to mean wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, flax, and sorghum. The term "future delivery," as used herein, shall not include any sale of cash grain for deferred shipment or delivery. The words "board of trade" shall be held to include and mean any exchange or association, whether incorporated or unincorporated, of persons who shall be engaged in the business of buying or selling grain or receiving the same for sale on consignment. The act, omission, or failure of any official, agent, or other person acting for any individual, association, partnership, corporation, or trust within the scope of his employment or office shall be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such individual, association, partnership, corporation, or trust, as well as of such official, agent, or other person. The words "interstate commerce" shall be construed to mean commerce between any State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, and any place outside thereof; or between points within the same State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, but through any place outside thereof, or within any Territory or possession, or the District of Columbia.

(b) For the purposes of this act (but not in anywise limiting the foregoing definition of interstate commerce) a transaction in respect to any article shall be considered to be in interstate commerce if such article is part of that current of commerce usual in the grain trade whereby grain and grain products and by-products thereof are sent from one State with the expectation that they will end their transit, after purchase, in another, including, in addition to cases within the above general description, all cases where purchase or sale is either for shipment to another State or for manufacture within the State and the shipment outside the State of the products resulting from such manufacture. Articles normally in such current of commerce shall not be considered out of such commerce through resort being had to any means or device intended to remove transactions in respect thereto from the provisions of this act. For the purpose of this paragraph the word "State" includes Territory, the District of Columbia, possession of the United States, and foreign nation.

The following committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "That for" and insert in lieu thereof the word "For."

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "That the" and insert the word "The."

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "That the" and insert the word "The."

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I propose to speak upon the subject of the coal-strike controversy and incidents connected therewith.

Mr. VOIGT. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, on last Thursday, in the coal fields of Illinois, there were murdered more than 20 unarmed, defenseless men. The killing of these men was accomplished by overpowering numbers and characterized by acts of extreme cruelty. There were no palliating facts, no mitigating circumstances.

No crime ever committed could have been more inhuman or revolting in its nature.

Condign punishment upon those confessedly guilty of the malicious and premeditated killing of these workingmen should be swift and certain. The so-called coroner's jury verdict, pretending to exculpate those responsible for the destruction of human life, indicates that these felons even have control of the processes of the law. The guilty authors of the atrocious felonies to which I have alluded have been laughing in their sleeves, and, if the public press is to be believed, their women folk, elated and gloating over the bloody work, gave palpable evidence of satisfaction and joy as they passed in review of the more than two score pallid, mangled, silent victims lying before them.

Not long ago 5,000 men, members of the mine workers' organization, undertook to invade Logan County, in my district, but they were successfully resisted. Had they succeeded, the fate of the miners in Logan County and the property of the operators there would have shared the same fate as befell the property and people of Herrin, Ill.

That labor has the right to organize I have never doubted; that necessity—self-defense—requires this to be done seems to me beyond question; that unionism has done much to ameliorate the hardships and improve the physical, ethical, and financial condition of the workingman is no less true.

Coal operators, oil producers, farmers, carriers, manufacturers, merchants, publishers, bankers, professional men—all groups—have their organizations, known as "associations," but these generally recognize the limitations of the law and do not resort to the use of dynamite or the Winchester rifle to accomplish their objects and purposes.

Unless the directing heads of the United Mine Workers of America shall unite with the officials of the State of Illinois in successfully prosecuting and adequately punishing the members who mobbed and brutally killed the nonunion workingmen at Herrin, then that organization will never be able to rise from the low estate to which certain of its own members have caused it to fall.

Many labor unions are conducted by men of brains upon the very highest plane. Members of such unions hate and detest the dynamiters of the Structural Bridge and Iron Workers and the murderers at Herrin, Ill., that have crept into the mine workers' union.

Editorial utterances from almost every printing press in the country are, as one great solemn voice of protest, crying out against the hideousness and the enormity of the crime and calling for the visitation of punishment upon those responsible for its perpetration.

Thoughtful persons are not blind to the fact that lawlessness during recent years has been fast gaining ground. Every crime in the category has been multiplied, the difficulty of securing convictions more accentuated. For lynchings there are no prosecutions, much less convictions. For crimes committed in the name of so-called industrial wars there are but few prosecutions, and these result only rarely in convictions.

I appeal to the strong patriotic men in the unions to take notice of the wrong and injury that violence and crime, where it exists, is doing unto them and their cause as well as to all of us.

The pendulum must swing back before it is forever too late.

We have our grievances. At times we are vexed with circumstances; but let us remember that nowhere on the earth is there a land the equal of ours. Our Government is the best. We should not abuse it or attempt to destroy it. Our opportunity is the greatest. Our standard of living is the highest; our workingmen the best paid. Readjustments are bound to be made in order that society may conform itself to after-war conditions. In spite of all that government can do there will be joltings and friction, and in some cases manifest injury. "They whom the gods would destroy they first make mad" is a classic; also a truthful phrase.

The legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government are being attacked. If you destroy one, you destroy the other two. When one is gone, all are gone. And with these go liberty and the Republic, with the result that free government has been a failure—a democracy being unable to rule itself—and hope, like a bird, has flown away.

My faith in the wisdom of the founding fathers—they who framed the Constitution—remains firm, but I do believe that the people must awaken and assert their rights. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object to this request, but I shall to any other request to speak out of order in this situation on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to enter into any discussion of the tragedy that was enacted in my own State and county, but we have just heard a rather vitriolic reference to it by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ], and on Saturday last some gentleman at the other end of the Capitol indulged in a discussion of the situation and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some press reports of the trouble which I think were unfair. In view of the utterances at the other end of the Capitol and of the gentleman from West Virginia, I feel that I ought to say just a word.

Mr. Chairman, I always think it is a mistake for men to try to discuss a subject, especially in a place like this, about which they know very little. I do not have very much information about it myself, although the transaction happened in my own county. The press reports are very inaccurate. Sometimes reporters in their zeal to make what they call a scoop and get off something sensational do a great injustice to individuals and to communities. I venture to say that not one-half of what has been reported in the press reports in respect to that unfortunate situation in Illinois is the truth. I know that a great deal of it that I have read is absolutely unreliable, especially so the reports of those horrifying and repulsive details to which the gentleman from West Virginia has just made reference.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. In a moment. I was a little surprised that the gentleman from West Virginia would dignify them by putting them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and repeating them in the House of Representatives without further verification. I do not believe that half of it is true. I have been receiving from my home State and from my district local newspapers which I believe give reasonably accurate accounts of it, but there is a great difference between what they say and the accounts carried in the metropolitan papers. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Does the gentleman in making that statement with reference to the press reports mean to say that not more than one-half is true in respect to the number stated to have been assassinated in cold blood for exercising their constitutional right to work for wages?

Mr. DENISON. I have not intended to say anything of that kind. I am simply stating that these reports about revolting details, about what the women did, and a great many other things that have been published are not reliable. And even the reports as to the number killed have been greatly exaggerated.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I am asking about the number stated to have been assassinated.

Mr. DENISON. I do not yield any further. These revolting details that have been printed in the papers are not reliable and are not true in many instances. It has been a most unfortunate affair, to say the least, for everyone concerned and from every point of view.

It has been unfortunate for those who were directly involved in it, unfortunate for the people of my State, unfortunate for the cause of union labor, and unfortunate because of the effect it may have on the entire country.

There is no one who abhors lawlessness more than I. There is no one who would condemn quicker than I the resort to force. We must all agree that a most serious situation has existed in Illinois under the facts as they were; but it ought not to be made worse by indulging in imagination and exaggeration in describing it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry that I have not the time. I have but a very short time; if I can complete my statement I will then be very glad to yield to the gentleman. The people of southern Illinois are law-abiding. All labor there is organized. For many years no industries there have been operated by nonunion labor. I do not believe there is any section of the country where the people, including those connected with and influential in organized labor, have more respect for the law and less patience with its violation than do the people of southern Illinois.

I am sure they regret this unfortunate tragedy as much as the people in any other part of the country. I do not think that the trouble there has resulted from a merely local condition. A resort to force under the circumstances which existed in Illinois might have happened in like manner in many other parts of the country. I feel I should not let go unchallenged statements which criticize those who were not concerned, as well as those who were concerned in this tragedy which has so shocked the country. There was a combination of circumstances which led up to it and which so aggravated and embittered the coal miners, who felt their interests were involved, that reason gave way to passion and brought about results which I am sure all must deplore.

Now, the gentleman from West Virginia has referred to the verdict of the coroner's jury. The information I have been furnished is that the coroner's jury heard, among other witnesses, some of the employees of the company whose mine was involved. The evidence of these witnesses was to the effect that the first man killed was a union miner, and that he was killed by an employee of the coal company when he was not committing any unlawful act. I am informed that this man was killed when he was seen approaching through the woods, and that testimony as to the manner of his death was clear and positive.

I am further informed that the union miners at Herrin had been deceived by the coal company and that the company had broken a contract which had been made between the company and the miners. The fact that the coal company had broken its contract and was beginning to operate and mine coal contrary to an agreement which was alleged to have been made with the miners; the fact that the miners had been out of employment for some three months; that they were hungry, and that their families were hungry, and that their places were being taken by imported nonunion labor; and the further fact that private guards, armed with machine guns and rifles, were parading about the property of the company challenging and threatening all who approached; and finally the killing of one of their number by one of the men in the mine, all so embittered and enraged the miners that the more conservative ones who were trying to settle the situation in a peaceable way seemed to have lost control and the more radical among them took the law into their own hands.

It is always to be regretted when men take the law into their own hands. The laws of our country must be supreme and must be respected and obeyed if our Government is to survive. But I mention these circumstances, not for the purpose of excusing what was done, but for the purpose of explaining it, and to the end that the Members may not have a distorted view of what did occur by reason of misleading reports and of the statement just made by the gentleman from West Virginia.

As a matter of further information, let me say that this tragedy occurred at what is known as a strip mine. In such a mine the coal is not taken out through a shaft or slope, as is usually done, but it is mined by stripping the dirt from above it and leaving the coal vein exposed, so that it may be easily blasted and shoveled into the cars. The vein of coal lies between 15 and 20 feet below the surface. Large steam shovels are used to scrape the dirt from above the vein of coal, and when the dirt above the coal is removed it is an easy matter to blast the coal and load it into cars for shipment to the market.

Now, all work has been suspended at all the mines in Illinois for about three months. This particular company desired to proceed with its work of stripping the vein of coal, removing the dirt, and getting its tracks laid ready to mine and market the coal just as soon as the strike was ended and work in the mines generally was resumed. My information is that the company entered into some sort of agreement with the union miners to the effect that they would do only the preliminary work of removing the dirt and getting ready to mine the coal, and that they would not undertake to mine and market the coal until after the strike was ended, and that in pursuance of that agreement union labor was employed for doing the work. My information further is that as soon as they had stripped the coal and removed the dirt and completed their other work preliminary to mining and marketing the coal they then discharged their union labor and imported something more than 50 nonunion men from Chicago and immediately began mining and marketing the coal, contrary to their agreement with the miners. I can not vouch for the absolute accuracy of this information, but it is the information which has come to me from my district.

Those who have not lived in the center of one of the greatest mining districts in the United States, where all work is done by union labor, and where all of the circumstances exist as I have just described them, can appreciate or understand the feelings and passions that would be aroused by unloading non-union strikebreakers, armed with machine guns and rifles, into the midst of such a community. Just as the murder of the Austrian archduke at Sarajevo plunged the whole world into war with all its awful results, so the killing of one of the miners under the circumstances I have thus stated may have ignited the fire which suddenly spread into conflagration and resulted so fatally and so unhappily for all concerned.

There has been some criticism of local officials for not doing their duty. The public is prone to place the blame somewhere as soon as possible. The sheriff of Williamson County may not have had proper prevision; he may not have used good judgment; we can not well judge him unless we know the facts; but I know him personally, and I do not believe a man could be found who is more courageous or less afraid to do his duty if he knew what his duty was.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that exaggerated newspaper reports and intemperate statements have been made in the RECORD here with reference to this affair. I hope that the Members and the public generally may suspend judgment and withhold at least excessive criticism until the facts may be brought to light and the truth known and until an ample opportunity has been given for the law to take its course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That transactions in grain involving the sale thereof for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade and known as "options" or "futures" are affected with a national public interest; that such transactions are carried on in large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that the prices of such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and in foreign countries as a basis for determining the prices to the producer and the consumer of grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that such transactions are utilized by shippers, dealers, millers, and others engaged in handling grain and the products thereof in interstate commerce as a means of hedging themselves against possible losses through fluctuations in prices; that the transactions on such boards are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control, which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling grain and products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce, and make such business unsafe and uncertain from time to time; and that such fluctuations in prices are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain and the products and by-products thereof and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, strike out the words "that transactions" and insert in lieu thereof the word "transactions."

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee this question: What does this proposed bill prohibit? I have been reading it; of course it is probably due to the fact that I am not quite familiar with the subject, and I desire to understand the meaning of the bill. What does this bill prohibit?

Mr. TINCHER. It is an attempt to prohibit the manipulation of the grain market, and the prohibition lies in these provisions, one of which is requiring a certain publicity, requiring exchanges before they can be designated as market places to comply with certain requirements. The Department of Agriculture worked out these requirements, and we think it will have the effect of prohibiting the manipulation of the grain market. We know it did have the effect of prohibiting the manipulation of the grain market during the time the law was in effect.

Mr. LONDON. But what particular manipulation does it prevent?

Mr. TINCHER. Manipulation by which the dealers between the producer and the consumer could, as they have in the last few weeks, reduce the price of wheat 30 per cent and still keep up the price of food products made of wheat to where it was before. This is certainly a manipulation of which no one is in favor, and that has often occurred on the grain market.

Mr. LONDON. Is this bill limited to prohibiting the dissemination of false information?

Mr. TINCHER. No; not limited to that, but that is included.

Mr. LONDON. That is one of the things; what are the others?

Mr. TINCHER. I think the best thing in the bill is the keeping of the records accessible to the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture of the actual transactions engaged in.

Mr. LONDON. The bill if enacted into law will not prevent gambling in futures or engaging in future contracts?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I never have said it would prevent it. I do not know just what the gentleman calls gambling.

Mr. LONDON. Speculating.

Mr. TINCHER. It will not prevent speculating in futures. It is an effort to supervise exchanges that engage in that practice.

Mr. LONDON. It is an effort to obtain information as to transactions? Is not that what the bill is intended to accomplish?

Mr. TINCHER. It does accomplish that, I think, among other things.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to explain to the gentleman from New York that outside of the prohibition of dissemination of inaccurate information there is not a thing done on the grain exchanges to-day anywhere that is prohibited by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELLIS. One of the requirements, one of the prerequisites, of an exchange becoming a contract market is that the board of directors of that exchange shall prevent manipulation, and that is all the word of prevention or prohibition there is in this.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am in principle in agreement with this bill, but I do not agree to the desirability of writing section 3 the way it is written in this bill. I do not believe that Congress can by reciting certain facts to be facts make them the law of the land. For instance, this section proceeds and says this in line 18:

Such transactions are carried on in large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and by-products thereof.

And then it goes on with a long recital of what is being done from day to day by certain persons. What difference does that make to the legislation if it is true? As a legal proposition, does it aid the bill any to recite those facts to be true, and by reciting them as facts do you make them facts? How do I know they are the facts? Does anybody in the House know they are the facts now that we are declaring solemnly that they are the facts? Nobody knows that. There may be something in the hearings that has convinced the committee that that is the truth, but what do you Members who are going to vote for the bill know about it? I do not know anything about it. If it is true, what does it add to the legislation? I think it is bad form and bad practice. It tries to make law out of facts that somebody claims are facts, and does not add anything to the legislation. I think the section ought to be stricken out unless somebody on the committee can tell me some reason why it should be there. I yield for that purpose to the chairman of the committee. I am in agreement with the idea of restricting gambling in grain futures, and if the gentleman from Kansas can tell me any good purpose in a legislative way that this serves I will be content if it satisfies my mind. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TINCHER. I am going to attempt to explain it.

Mr. Chairman, there was no dissension in the committee except on the part of one member, as to whether the statements in section 3 were warranted by the testimony that we heard. The idea of including that language in the law was taken from the Supreme Court decision. I think it would be a serious blow to this bill to strike that language from it, and I do not think anyone will seriously contradict any proposition in that section. Let me say that the court goes to the reports of committees under recent practices for the attitude of Congress toward legislation. In the decision in the packer case the court got the attitude of Congress toward the packer bill from the report of the bill, and it so stated in the opinion.

Now, I believe that section 3 recites the attitude of this Congress in this matter. If not, it will be voted down. If the members of this committee or the Members of the House do not agree that that is the attitude of the Congress, then strike it out. If you do so, you will kill the bill.

Now, I want to say, regardless of any charge of populism by my distinguished friend from Kansas City, regardless of my inability to please either of the distinguished gentlemen from Chicago, I believe that the whole American people recognize that there is a public interest in the foodstuffs of this Nation that are purchased from the farmers of this Nation and that the public has an interest, whether in the city or in the country, in the matter, and I believe the time has come when a man need not fear being charged with being a Populist simply because the grain exchanges of Kansas City or any other city can not tell him how to vote on any proposition that comes up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have made it a rule not to speak out of order, but I trust my colleagues will patiently listen to me this afternoon. Those who were here in 1916 recall that the Florida delegation came before our colleagues because the legislature of the State would not meet until the following year, and requested that you give to us some assistance to eradicate citrus canker, which had been brought into this country because of the laxity of our laws at that time. The Florida delegation pledged the Members of Congress that we would meet the appropriation dollar for dollar as soon as the legislature could meet, and we have carried out that pledge. My colleague, the distinguished and able gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] will bear me out in the assertion that I have not opposed any reduction in the appropriation to stop this disease, or whatever you may call it, and at the last session, when the appropriation was cut down to $30,000, no man on the Florida delegation raised his voice in protest, because we did not want money when we did not need it. I have fought every appropriation for needless expenditure of money. Unfortunately this disease has not been stamped out because the work has been confined to the State and not to the States where the citrus industry is not of any importance. That my colleagues may thoroughly understand and appreciate the situation, I want to present to you just a few facts.

From 1916 to 1922 my State appropriated and expended $714,226.35 for the purpose of assisting the Government dollar for dollar in eradicating this dreadful disease. There was raised by private subscriptions $87,369.91, which was also expended. You will recall, those of you who served with me at that time, that we asked nothing of Congress for the trees that were being destroyed. There is no way to fight citrus canker except by burning the trees to the ground, which means a total loss. Let me call your attention to the fact that from May 1, 1914, to May 30, 1922, in the State of Florida there were grove trees to the number of 235,590 burned and destroyed; there were nursery trees, numbering 2,645,514 destroyed, with a property valuation of something between five and six million dollars and our citizens did not ask Congress for one single dollar to recompense them for the loss of these trees.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I yield.

Mr. LAYTON. We have had hundreds and hundreds of thousands of peach trees destroyed and pulled up in my State, and we never asked a penny from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. SEARS. We did not, and we did not get an appropriation.

Mr. LAYTON. I thought you had, dollar for dollar.

Mr. SEARS. No; only in fighting it. Did you have no assistance in fighting the disease you refer to?

Mr. LAYTON. No; nothing.

Mr. SEARS. The Federal Government has expended $883,000 in cooperating with the different States where this disease exists. Our legislature does not meet until next April, and we have not sufficient funds with which to fight the disease, and unless Congress acts promptly it will perhaps cost the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars. If you act promptly it will cost only a small amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SEARS. May I have a little more time?

Mr. TINCHER. I have no more time to yield to gentlemen speaking on a subject other than the bill.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Section 3, page 4, line 6, strike out "extremely" and insert "possibly."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that transactions on boards of trade are not extremely susceptible to speculation. The contrary is true. They are possibly susceptible to speculation, and those men who attempt to speculate on the board of trade invariably have lost money as the result of it. Mr. Joseph Leiter speculated and lost more money than ever any man had before or since, and the history of the boards proves conclusively that they are not extremely subject or susceptible to speculation. I ask that the word "extremely" be stricken out and that the word "possibly" be inserted.

The word "extremely" in this connection is a gross exaggeration. Transactions on boards of trade are not "extremely" susceptible to manipulation and control. On the contrary, attempts to manipulate and control the markets are invariably fraught with grave danger to those who make the attempt. So much so, in fact, that there has been no successful manipulation of the markets in the last five years.

On the Chicago Board of Trade buyers and sellers from all over the world meet on common ground. The world's brightest commercial minds are here represented bargaining for grain on the spot. The world's keenest speculative wits here give expression to their combined opinions as to the value of grain for future delivery. The prices so determined may be said to represent the majority judgment of the world regarding values. No better medium for estimating values could possibly be established. In such a market transactions are not extremely susceptible to manipulation and control, and attempts to manipulate and control almost invariably meet with failure. I repeat, Mr. Joseph Leiter manipulated and controlled the wheat market to a greater extent and for a greater length of time than any one speculator ever did before or since, and Mr. Joseph Leiter in so doing lost more money than any other one speculator ever lost before or since. The history of the markets proves conclusively that they are not extremely susceptible to manipulation and control. Therefore the word "extremely" has no place in this section of the bill.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up much time in passing upon these amendments. I suppose I know what they are. They are the same amendments that were offered in the committee. The amendments that the gentleman from Illinois is offering are not warranted by the testimony adduced before the committee. I do not think anyone who has read the hearings would vote for the amendments. This amendment, and I suppose the other amendments that he offered in committee that are to follow, should be rejected. I hope they will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to offer at the same place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold my amendment for the time being.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I move to strike out the word "extremely."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM:
Page 4, line 6, strike out the word "extremely."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, that will leave the sentence to read as follows: "That the transactions on such boards are susceptible of speculation, manipulation, and control."

Now, I dare say the proof does not warrant the use of the word "extremely." Why go to so many extremes in this bill? I want to ask whether the chairman of the committee will not consent to the omission of the word?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I will not consent to the omission of the word. I think the language is absolutely true. Witnesses from the exchange appeared to demonstrate that that was not true, but we proved from other testimony that it was true. I would be very much opposed to the word going out.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Well, I guess the steam roller is in operation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois:
Section 3, page 4, line 8, strike out the word "frequently" and insert the word "might."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in this connection the word "frequently" is undeniably misused. Unreasonable fluctuation in prices of grain never occurs, although sudden changes in prices do occur from time to time. So long as we have sudden changes in the weather and in the supply and demand there will also be extensive changes in prices, and, manifestly, there should be such changes, because no changes in price occur without a valid reason. As a matter of fact the figures show for a number of years a slighter range of prices than any other farm product or commodity. The use of the word "frequently" in this connection is, to my mind, a palpable misstatement, and I ask that it be stricken out.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the word "unreasonable" objectionable?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Yes; that should go out, too.

Mr. LONDON. Of course, there is no such thing as a fluctuation being reasonable or unreasonable. It is not the dictate of a particular reason, the working of the law of logic, or the failure to work or operate on the grain.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the gentleman is correct, but if we are going to undertake to correct all the inconsistencies that you will find in such a recitation as is contained in this section, you will be a long time in doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have other perfecting amendments.

Mr. MILLS. Then I will withdraw that for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The perfecting amendments will be passed on first. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] desire to be heard further?

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. No; not on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Section 3, page 4, line 10, strike out the word "are" and insert the words "would be."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, what I said before on the previous amendment applies to this also. I think this is a misstatement of facts. The bill says:

Which "are" detrimental to the producer or the consumer.

I move to substitute the words "would be." If such statement were true, they would be detrimental, but there were no facts produced before the committee and there is no testimony given that warrants language of this kind. I think it is a misstatement of facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I have another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Amend section 3, page 4, line 12, after the word "and" insert the words "would tend to."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as the bill reads now it is a positive statement that these things make such business unsafe and uncertain from time to time. The amendment I offer simply suggests that if the facts recited in this declaration were true they would tend to make such business unsafe.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Amend section 3, page 4, line 14, by striking out the word "are" and inserting the words "might prove."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, here is a positive assertion that fluctuations of prices are an obstruction to and burden upon interstate commerce. I can simply repeat that from all the testimony presented to the Committee on Agriculture there is no evidence that would warrant such a declaration as we have in this paragraph. If my amendment is adopted, I think the suggestion that fluctuations in prices "might prove" an obstruction would be a more proper statement of facts. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois) there were—ayes 27, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Amend, section 3, page 4, line 16, after the word "and" insert the word "might."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the committee in reporting this bill mistake an assumption for a fact. They say that these things render regulation imperative. I simply ask that the statement be clarified as the facts in the case warrant by inserting the word "might" before the word "render."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am not much disposed to rush in where angels fear to tread. I have not very much desire to argue a proposition after it is perfectly manifest that the "critter's eyes are sot." I am opposed to this amendment, because it simply, by changing the verbiage, makes a bad matter no better. I want to call attention to section 3. Particularly I would call attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], who inquired of the gentleman from Kansas about it. The gentleman from Illinois got little information from the manager of the bill.

I was present during all the hearings on this bill. I heard the solicitor from the bureau explain section 3. The solicitor told the committee that the reason section 3 was inserted was to afford jurisdiction; to confer power upon Congress under the commerce clause to dominate the grain exchanges of this country. Subdivision (b) of section 2 and section 3, taken together, furnish the foundation for the determined purpose of this committee, expressed in this bill, that a bureau shall dominate the business of the grain exchanges of this country. Do not be deceived at all about that. The fact will be manifest to any of you if you will read in the hearings what Mr. Morrill, the solicitor of the bureau, said to the committee.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to correct one other misapprehension. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] spoke a little hastily when he declared that the grain exchanges of this country do not object to supervision. Perhaps that will be true if you will define "supervision." But I want to say to you that the seven grain exchanges that would be affected by the passage of this bill are, every one of them, opposed to every provision in it from beginning to end. If this is what is meant by supervision, they will have none of it. The Kansas City exchange has millions of dollars invested in the facilities and instrumentalities that have made that a great grain market. I heard my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] in his remarks just now, but I call him to witness that he has felicitated me many times during this summer upon the high level of prices and the stability of the Kansas City Grain Exchange. Those men who have invested their money and have built up that exchange until it has become one of the foremost grain markets in this country individually and collectively object to the domination of their private business by a Government bureau. [Applause.]

Now, returning to section 3, let there be no misunderstanding. Here are findings of fact that these gentlemen want us to put into this bill. They have no place in the bill. Let us not be deceived about the purposes and desires of the proponents of the legislation. They want us to make findings of fact that will go to the Supreme Court of the United States when this bill is challenged there. Findings of fact have no place in a legislative enactment. If a practice like this can be tolerated, the Constitution can be twisted and distorted to serve almost any sort of domination of intrastate business.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman says that these are findings of fact.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does the gentleman believe that the public generally can engage in futures operations on the exchanges?

Mr. ELLIS. It says so right here, in section 3. It is recited here that the public generally engage in futures trading.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But is it the truth that the public generally engages in futures?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, surely. That is the finding that is wanted. Read the section where it says that the public generally engages in these transactions, this trading in futures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this point. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I think "unreasonable" is a very good word to select in pausing during this hurried consideration of this bill. I have no quarrel with my friend from Missouri who just made the statement that the exchanges and boards of trade as a matter of fact are not anxious for supervisory legislation. That is no doubt true. I do not think there is any business in the country that is anxious to have the Government or the Congress of the United States go into their business for the purpose of supervising and controlling it. [Applause.]

We have consistently opposed legislation of that kind; but it seems that this Congress is determined to pass something of this sort. It passed the last bill and seems to be determined to pass this one. My complaint at this moment is that you are not giving it the consideration which it should have and you are not trying to perfect the legislation. Every proposition made here is voted down. You simply assume that what the committee has brought here is so perfect that it can not be improved. The gentleman from New York has been patiently waiting to make a motion to strike out the section. I presume the gentleman from Kansas in charge of the bill will object to striking out the word "unreasonable," but I would ask him to define what an unreasonable fluctuation is.

Mr. TINCHER. I will give the gentleman an illustration. The depreciation in the price of wheat between the 15th of May and the 10th of June was a most damnably unreasonable depression and fluctuation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But suppose it was.

Mr. TINCHER. It was, and we propose to stop that kind of thing; they have robbed the farmers of this country long enough.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How does the gentleman know what caused the fluctuations of the market? Only yesterday the New York Times, which does not represent the Chicago exchange, had a dispatch from Chicago reading as follows:

WEAK UNDERTONE IN CHICAGO WHEAT—WEATHER RUMORS, WEEK-END EVENING UP, AND LACK OF EXPORT DEMAND SEND MARKET DOWN.

[Special to the New York Times.]

CHICAGO, June 24.—General week-end evening up and reports of showers in parts of Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas gave the grain markets a weak undertone early.

That most "unreasonable" report of showers in Kansas brought down the market price and created an undertone in wheat quotations. The dispatch continues:

Lowest prices were made early and short covering toward the last brought about a rally, with wheat closing one-eighth to three-fourths cent and corn one-half to five-eighths cent lower, while oats showed independent strength and finished one-eighth to one-half cent higher.

Commission houses and local traders sold freely early and found support in wheat and corn lacking for a time. The first reports indicated that the rains had been rather extensive, but this was not confirmed later and, as far as wheat and oats are concerned, very little grain outside of the Northwest would be benefited by moisture from now on, as the grain is too far advanced.

Sentiment in wheat has become somewhat more bearish, and cash interests are apparently working to widen the spread between the July and the September, which went to around 1¼ cents at one time with some hedging pressure on the July.

Although purchases to arrive were given at only 100,000 bushels, bids of $1 per bushel at some points in Illinois brought much less grain than expected.

A Missouri State report suggested that the extreme heat of last week cut 8,000,000 bushels off the prospective yield of that State, and the Kansas State report in detail indicated that the Government July report would show a small decrease in the estimate of that State from the 117,000,000 bushels estimated in June.

There is no urgent demand for wheat either from domestic or foreign buyers at the present time, which counts rather heavily against sustained bulges at the present time. Black rust in its early stages is being found at numerous points in the Northwest, and, under average conditions, it reaches the damaging stage around July 1 to 4. The trade, however, paid little attention to the rust claims to-day.

Heavy crop and property losses have resulted from a severe storm in the Canadian Northwest. Export demand was slow.

All of these things caused a fluctuation in prices, and the Congress of the United States solemnly passes legislation under which such fluctuations are described as "unreasonable." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this is an important provision in this bill, and those who are offering these amendments are trying to emasculate it. I doubt whether they want to make the measure effective. The gentleman from New York has been having nervous rigors for the last five minutes trying to get the floor to offer an amendment striking out the paragraph. This paragraph is the foundation for the legislation proposed in this bill. It is the statement of the basis upon which the bill is to be enacted.

The statement has been made that it is something unheard of in legislation. Let me read from the decision of the court in the Packer case.

Chief Justice Taft made a preliminary statement of facts, reciting the evidence before the committee, and said that the evidence found by the Federal Trade Commission was to the effect that a conspiracy existed to control prices. Let me read a portion of that preliminary statement:

It appeared from the data before the committee that for more than two decades it had been charged that the five great packing establishments of Swift, Armour, Cudahy, Wilson, and Morris, called the "Big Five," were engaged in a conspiracy * * * to control the business of the purchase of the live stock, their preparation for use in meat products, and the distribution and sale thereof in this country and abroad.

In the actual opinion the Chief Justice, in commenting on these facts, makes the following statement:

We have framed the statement of the case, not for the purpose of deciding the issues of fact mooted between the packers and their accusers before the Federal Trade Commission or the Committees of Agriculture in Congress, but only to enable us to consider and discuss the act whose validity is here in question in the light of the environment in which Congress passed it. It was for Congress to decide, from its general information and from such special evidence as was brought before it, the nature of the evils actually present or threatening, and to take such steps by legislation within its power as it deemed proper to remedy them. It is helpful for us, in interpreting the effect and scope of the act, in order to determine its validity, to know the conditions under which Congress acted.

The court says it is helpful to the court in interpreting the effect and scope of the act, and in order to determine its validity, to know the conditions under which Congress acted. This section states a conspiracy to control prices just as the finding which Chief Justice Taft recites in the packer case. It was probably unnecessary to recite all of the matters set out, but the substance of the statement should have been included, and I can see no harm in the additional inclusion.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Is it usual to put in a bill an expression of opinion?

Mr. JONES of Texas. This is not an expression of opinion. It is a declaration which shows the jurisdiction of the Congress in the matter.

Mr. HULL. If it is, will the gentleman cite the precedents for it?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I decline to yield. It is usual, it is absolutely necessary, as you will find in the previous decision in the grain case, for Congress to make a statement of the basis on which it enacts legislation covering interstate commerce. It is altogether proper and may be essential to the validity of this bill that the statement be made of the basis upon which the bill is enacted into law.

Mr. HULL. When was it ever done before?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has been done frequently. That is what is hurting these fellows who are opposed to this bill. They do not want this finding in the legislation because they know what it means.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I wanted to suggest the substitution of the word "violent" instead of the word "unreasonable."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order. The last word has been disposed of several times. I want to get on with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to be heard on his motion. The Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not opposed to the reasonable regulation of grain exchanges. I am opposed to using a bill for propaganda purposes, as is done in section 3 of this bill. I might say that I have had some experience in the grain business. I followed it for 25 years. I know something of what is necessary in carrying on the grain business, and I know that the grain buyer, the actual buyer of the grain from the farmer, must have an opportunity to hedge his sales, and by that I simply mean what is being done every day. The actual buyer of the grain must be able to sell the grain the day he buys it. He can not go to a bank and borrow money and pay the farmer for the grain that he has bought unless he sells it, and can say to the banker, "I bought this grain for so much and sold it in Chicago for so much, I have protected the deal, I want $10,000, can you give it to me?" The banker, if he has properly carried out that transaction and is protected, will loan him the money, and much of the grain business in this country is conducted on that plan.

I am seriously afraid that gentlemen are ignoring that fact in the consideration of this bill. Your grain exchanges are necessary. You can not eliminate them. You can not eliminate the hedge sale unless you eliminate all possibility of the grain buyer who buys the grain in Iowa of the farmer and sells it to the consumer in New York City. He does not know the consumer in New York City, he only knows the grain buyer in Chicago, but the day that he buys the grain in Iowa he sells it in Chicago, and the Chicago grain buyer sells it to the man in New York City, who at the same time probably sells it to the man in the State of New York or to a foreign exporter.

Mr. FUNK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. FUNK. Is it the gentleman's contention that that is the only process by which a country grain buyer can hedge, as the gentleman calls the transaction?

Mr. HULL. My contention is that that is one of the ways that the grain buyer conducts his business.

Mr. FUNK. Does not the gentleman know as a matter of fact that most of the grain is bought on postal-card bids rather than on the basis of a hedge?

Mr. HULL. I know that some of it is and I know that a great deal of it is sold for future delivery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MILLS: Page 3, line 15, strike out all of section 3.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I take it that it is the duty of the House, sitting in Committee of the Whole, to perfect legislation, if possible, in so far as the actual mechanics of bill drafting are concerned, and while it is a difficult task to perfect this measure, which is one of the worst drawn bills that it has ever been my misfortune to read—and in confirmation of that statement I defy any Member of the House to say what subdivision (f) of section 5 means—yet it is our duty to try to perfect it in the interest of good bill drafting, in the interest of good lawmaking. I submit to you, gentlemen, that a statement of fact contained in the body of a law is something so extraordinary as to cause us to pause and wonder. Search your memories. Have you ever read a law on the statute books which contained a statement of fact in the body of the law? Have you ever read a bill presented to you as Members of this body which contained a statement of fact in the body of the bill? It is preposterous. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] said that the Supreme Court would take notice of the findings of fact and of the evidence presented to a committee of Congress. Of course they will; but that is evidence presented in the hearings. This statement contained in the report of the committee would be eminently proper as a finding of fact of the committee, and the Supreme Court would pay attention to it; but if this bill passes this House and the Senate and is signed by the President it becomes law; and then, lo and behold, what have you done? You have declared facts by law, if you please. It is futile. The Supreme Court will find what the facts are irrespective of what you allege them to be. They can not take your word as final. Facts are stubborn things. You can not change facts by act of Congress. So that this proposition is not only bad from the standpoint of draftsmanship, novel in character and thoroughly unscientific, but it is perfectly futile in so far as the Supreme Court is concerned.

In the third place, I want to submit to you gentlemen that you are making Congress ridiculous. We have been accused time and time again of trying to accomplish by law what can not be accomplished by law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I can not yield. However, no Congress, no legislative body in this country until to-day, has been asked to declare facts by law. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] asks us to pass a law declaring certain facts to be so, irrespective of whether they are or not, and I submit that that is a thing that can not be done. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the friends of this measure that those who are attacking section 3 have method in their madness, because if this section is stricken out you might just as well kill the bill, because the section preceding it, subsection (b) of section 2, which defines interstate commerce, is the thing upon which the section that follows is predicated. If you knock the foundation out from that, you knock the foundation out of the bill. Why? The Supreme Court has decided that the original grain futures bill was unconstitutional because it said that Congress did not have the right to regulate these grain exchanges by taxation, the same as in reference to regulating child labor, and has stated that it is on all fours with the child labor law, and therefore they could not be regulated by the system of taxation.

Now, therefore, in order to get a law that will regulate these grain exchanges the Committee on Agriculture is trying to pass a bill now to regulate them through the interstate commerce clause. This bill was carefully prepared, I understand, by the legal division of the Department of Agriculture. I am frank to say that I had nothing to do with the preparation of it, and when gentlemen make statements on the floor of this House that this bill has not been considered and the Committee on Agriculture did not give it due consideration they do not know what they are talking about. The question of regulating these grain exchanges has been before the Commitee on Agriculture for years, as is evidenced by volumes of evidence that have been taken before that committee. Why my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM]—and he is my good friend—says that somehow or other the Committee on Agriculture of the House wants to go to further extremes for the farmer than any other committee goes in any other direction. Well, if I remember correctly I do not think the Committee on Agriculture has gone to much further extremes for the benefit of the farmer than the majority of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the railroads when they passed the Esch-Cummins bill which took hundreds of millions of dollars out of the pockets of the people of this country for the railroads.

Mr. LAYTON. And took away all of the power.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not think they went much further than I understand the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries now are fixing to go in respect to the ship subsidy bill that is admitted by the department itself will cost over $52,000,000 from the people of this country for the benefit of the Shipping Trust of this country. I do not think they have gone much further than the Ways and Means Committee, the majority members of it, when they passed the protective tariff bill under a gag rule of the House in order to put a practically prohibitive wall around this country for the benefit of the manufacturers of this country. We realize these gentlemen in a spirit of derision, these "farmers' friends"—the "farmer" who preceded me, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], and my good friend from Chicago [Mr. CHINDBLOM], the gentleman from Kansas City [Mr. ELLIS], and the gentleman from Minneapolis [Mr. NEWTON]—have great interest in the farmer in this bill.

The gentleman from Kansas City told the truth when he said these grain-board exchanges did not want to be supervised. That is the truth. The packers of the country did not want to be supervised. Why, take the packers of the country, who can make more profit out of a four-year old steer in a day than a farmer can in four years in raising them. That is all right. The grain exchange can make more speculating in 100,000 bushels of grain than a thousand farmers in a year could in raising it. But, notwithstanding that, they said we do not propose to be regulated, and now when there is this attempt to regulate in behalf of producers and consumers of this country this bill is held up to derision as being a joke—a business joke. If it was a joke, you would not hear these gentlemen here in much opposition to it. The sole purpose of this legislation is to prevent manipulation in grain on the boards of trade in this country and the gambling in grain. Why, the packers, when the agitation first started, came before our committee and they said time and again, with tears in their eyes almost, that if we passed this packers bill it would put them out of business and the farmer in marketing his products. Gentlemen say now if we pass this bill the grain exchanges will be put out of business. We passed the other and we did not put them out of business. The Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional. I say this bill is for the benefit of the producers of this country, and if you want this bill passed with teeth in it vote down the amendment to strike out this section because it will ruin the bill. I can not understand in this country to-day, with the teeming millions in the cities, all consumers of the products of the farmer, why they would not be as much, if not more, interested in seeing the prosperity of the farmers and that he may produce at a profit and thereby increase the supply as much as the farmer himself, and the time has come in this country when we have got to have legislation for the benefit of the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to ask the gentleman, if he will tell us, what help this section 3 gives to the bill?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Why, you might just as well strike out subsection (b) of section 2, which defines interstate commerce.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman believe the Supreme Court would follow the findings of facts on this section of the bill?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is the gentleman for or against the bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know yet, and I am anxious to get information from the gentleman.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Well, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] says that——

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to know if the gentleman thinks so.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to you candidly as a lawyer——

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is it; as a lawyer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. After hearing all this legislation discussed, hearing the evidence in the case, that I would not give you a cent for subsection (b) of section 2 if you strike out section 3.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am asking if the Supreme Court of the United States would follow this section or follow the facts.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I think they would follow both.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TINCHER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 54, noes 43.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. TINCHER and Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, the opponents of this bill manifest what appears to me to be gross inconsistency. In the first place, I have sat here and listened to gentlemen charge that all the evils to be avoided by this bill do not exist. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] admits that the recitals of the section under consideration are an accurate statement of the facts and the recital a true statement of the practices of grain gamblers in the great centers. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] admits the recitations of section 3 are true facts. His objection to the measure is that it is not artfully drawn. Other gentlemen admit the practices but contend that the Congress is powerless to prevent the evils of grain gambling in interstate commerce on constitutional grounds.

I am glad that this bill is in charge of the gentleman from the agricultural State of Kansas. There was a very great Kansan once who described the practices it is designed by this bill to remove from interstate commerce. The evil practices denounced by this bill are those transactions carried on by the exchanges of the country that were so forcibly described on one occasion by Senator Ingalls.

Senator Ingalls, in an address to the law class of Missouri University on one occasion, said:

> An option deal is a transaction which is carried on over a telegraph wire that reaches from some great city to a small country town, with a damn fool at one end of the line and a damn rascal at the other.

[Laughter.]

This bill does not propose to prevent any legitimate, necessary, or useful transaction in the grain markets of the country. By the bill the committee does not intend that hedging or any other useful or necessary transaction in the purchase and sale of grain shall be prohibited.

By the bill, as the committee has framed it, it is proposed to remove and prevent in interstate commerce, so far as dealing in grain is concerned, the criminal and unlawful transactions described by Senator Ingalls, and which all agree are wrong, immoral, and are denounced by the law of every State as against public policy.

All of us know that the transactions which this bill is designed to prevent are no part of the legitimate commerce of the country. We who are lawyers have often been called upon to defend suits upon notes or other obligations arising out of such transactions, and so far as I know every respectable court refuses to compel performance of any contract or obligation based upon such transactions, so forcibly described by Senator Ingalls and denounced by every provision of this bill.

By the bill it is expected that the illegal transactions in the grain market, through which the grain gamblers by pretended purchases and sales, all fictitious, often in a day pretend to buy and sell more grain than can be grown in all the fields in the United States in the course of the year, for the reason that by such pretended purchases and sales the markets of the country are manipulated by fictitious speculation to the detriment of the producers of grain and food products and to the consumers of the same as well.

The terms used in the act, descriptive of the transactions that are prohibited, unmistakably show what it is designed by the bill to accomplish.

The terms used, to which objection has been made, have a well-defined legal meaning when used in other laws in similar connection.

For instance, objection is made by the opponents of the bill to the word reasonable, used in the act to describe fluctuations that are produced by manipulation of the market.

The word reasonable in this same connection in similar laws has been defined and its meaning established. For instance, contracts in restraint of trade are illegal everywhere, only provided they are unreasonable. So far as I know the courts of every State agree that contracts may be entered into by which one man will agree that he will not engage in a particular business at a particular place or for a fixed number of years. Such a contract it has been held would be in restraint of trade and commerce, but it would be valid because not an unreasonable restraint.

So the Supreme Court of the United States properly held that under the Sherman Antitrust Act it was only contracts that unreasonably restrain trade are invalid.

By the laws of every State in the Union the transactions prohibited by the provisions of this bill are made unlawful. The acts described in this bill can not be prohibited by the States because the Congress is given absolute control over interstate commerce.

We alone, through our control over interstate commerce, have power to relieve that commerce of the criminal practices described by the bill and which have proved so harmful to the grain growers of the United States and to the consumers of the products of our farms.

The facts recited in the bill while denied by some are admitted by others and known to exist by most of us, and by the bill we are merely applying a remedy to the wrongs that exist in the grain market.

If the practices denounced in the bill are wrong, if they are unlawful and against public policy, why should not Congress forbid their further practice in interstate commerce? That is all there is to it, and it is no excuse in my judgment to strike the heart from the bill, as the pending motion proposes to do, by striking out section 3 of the same.

So far as I am concerned, the evils being admitted and Congress having exclusive power over the subject, no injury being done to any legitimate deal or transaction had in that commerce, and power existing nowhere else to correct the evils, it is up to Congress to act and act at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, as I said when on my feet before, we are asked to make findings of fact. It is agreed now, all around, that the superstructure of this bill will rest upon these findings. I want to call your attention to some of the evidence upon which, if at all, we shall have to make them. I want, before I go to that, to express my deliberate opinion—with great respect for the members of this Committee on Agriculture, many of whom are my personal friends—of the language contained in section 3. Take the expression that "transactions on these boards are subject to fluctuations." That is neither good English nor good sense. What the solicitor meant to say, no doubt, is that the prices in those transactions are subject to fluctuation. That is true. The dictionary's definition of speculation is, "Selling, with the expectation that prices will go down; buying, with the expectation that prices will go up." Do you want, do you expect, to suppress speculation on these boards? Those are the normal transactions in every market.

Now, let us come to the evidence.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. Pardon me; I have not the time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to say that I agree with the argument the gentlemen is making, but I do not think the committee is responsible for it. As I understand, the bill was made in the department.

Mr. ELLIS. It was made in the department. It is absolutely a bureau bill—of the bureau, by the bureau, and for the bureau.

There were two men that came before the committee. One of them was Mr. Gates, of Chicago, a man of high character, large experience, unusual intelligence. When he was before the committee they kowtowed to him and told him how they respected him as a first-class business man. They did not intimate he was a gambler or treat him as if he were one. "If you will go back over the hearings," said Mr. Gates, "you will find that grain men from all over the country came here to testify that this (futures trading) was an essential part of their conducting business safely. There was nothing said about this making it unsafe. There was no testimony anywhere in the record to indicate that there were frequent attempts at manipulation. It was specified, when it was mentioned at all, that they were of infrequent occurrence and that they were very difficult to bring about in the conditions under which the markets are controlled."

Either the gentleman from Kansas is wrong or this witness was wrong. The witness was absolutely and wholly right. He had read the hearings and I have read the hearings.

The other gentleman was Mr. Wells, of Minneapolis, and he, too, was complimented by the members of the committee—was recognized and treated as a man of the highest standing. What does he say? I read:

> I fail to find in the record testimony of men of experience that transactions are extremely susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control. It has been admitted that at times, under abnormal conditions, there have been evidences of manipulation; possibly there has been manipulation, but it is not a continuing feature of the market. It is something that happens in our markets only under abnormal conditions.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the testimony. There is no other evidence upon which to make the finding the solicitor has prepared to help him sustain himself before the court.

Any man who knows anything about these transactions—and there is not, of course, one in ten of us who knows anything about them—any man who is familiar with market operations knows that when these manipulations occur, when a corner is effected on the market, it is in spite of regulations; that when they occur the operation transcends the spirit and letter of all rules, all regulations—is a defiance of rules, an uncontrolled, uncontrollable mutiny against the established order on these exchanges.

Gentlemen, if you make these findings of fact, you do it on the ipse dixit of the man who is managing this bill. You do not do it on any evidence; you do it against all the evidence and all the facts in this case. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person to deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication any offer to make or execute, or any confirmation of the execution of, or any quotation or report of the price of, any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States, or for any person to make or execute such contract of sale, which is or may be used for (a) hedging any transaction in interstate commerce in grain or the products or by-products thereof, or (b) determining the price basis of any such transaction in interstate commerce, or (c) delivering grain sold, shipped, or received in interstate commerce for the fulfillment thereof, except—
> (a) Where the seller is at the time of the making of such contract the owner of the actual physical property covered thereby, or is the grower thereof, or in case either party to the contract is the owner or renter of land on which the same is to be grown, or is an association of such owners, or growers of grain, or of such owners or renters of land; or
> (b) Where such contract is made by or through a member of a board of trade which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a "contract market," as hereinafter provided, and if such contract is evidenced by a memorandum in writing which shows the date, the parties to such contract and their addresses, the property covered and its price, and the terms of delivery: Provided, That each board member shall keep such memorandum for a period of three years from the date thereof, or for a longer period if the Secretary of Agriculture shall so direct, which record shall at all times be open to the inspection of any representative of the United States Department of Agriculture or the United States Department of Justice.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A committee amendment will be considered first. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment: On page 4, line 19, strike out the words "That it" and insert in lieu thereof the word "It."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment proposed by Mr. STEENERSON to H. R. 11843:
> Strike out lines 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 on page 4 and the first three words in line 1 on page 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "It shall be unlawful for any person to offer to make or execute any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States," so as to make the first subdivision of section 4 read as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person to offer to make or execute any contract of sale of grain for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any board of trade in the United States, or for any person to make or execute such contract of sale, which is or may be used for (a) hedging any transaction in interstate commerce in grain or the products or by-products thereof, or (b) determining the price of any such transaction in interstate commerce, or (c) delivering grain sold, shipped, or received in interstate commerce for the fulfillment thereof, except "——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the decision of the Supreme Court held that transactions on a board of trade in future dealings in grain were not interstate commerce, as far as it appeared in the recitals of the first Tincher bill. The court held that you could not use the taxing power to accomplish indirectly what you could not do directly, because these transactions were intrastate, and therefore you could not invoke the taxing power or get jurisdiction of them and do indirectly what you could not do directly. In the first child-labor case they held that you could not use the interstate commerce power for the purpose of controlling child labor, because that also was a subject within the jurisdiction of the States, and that therefore that law which prohibited the interstate commerce movement of articles made by child labor in a factory was void.

Now, here comes the proposition to use the postal power to accomplish the same thing. But the reasoning of the court tends to the conclusion that neither of these powers can be invoked for this illegal purpose. You can not confer upon Congress jurisdiction of subjects that Congress has not jurisdiction of by invoking either of these powers.

The only saving clauses to this bill are section 2 and section 3, which you have refused to strike out. While those sections do not assert that these things are interstate commerce, they do declare that these transactions in futures in grain on the boards of trade are affected with a public interest, and that they do injuriously or otherwise burden and affect interstate commerce, just the same as the Supreme Court has declared that the railroad rates on intrastate traffic, although wholly within the power of the States, may be taken under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission when they burden or hamper the power of that commission over interstate commerce.

Now, these recitals in sections 1 and 2 are intended to confer jurisdiction. That is what Mr. Morrill said. That is what they are written for, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS] and the gentleman from Minneapolis [Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota] were correct in their statements that this is an attempt to recite facts which will confer jurisdiction, because they say that these transactions on the boards of trade are affected with a public interest and that they burden interstate commerce. If so, Congress has complete power over them, and you can regulate those transactions, but you can not do it by reason of the postal power which is attempted in section 4, which I am here seeking to strike out. This section, which excludes all communication, either through the mails or through any other means between the States, is an attempt by indirection to get jurisdiction of a matter over which Congress has no power. If you leave this section in the bill in the way in which it is written, you make the bill unconstitutional; but if you strike it out your bill, in my opinion, will be valid, because it will then be an attempt to regulate commerce, or at least to regulate a matter that affects and burdens interstate commerce, just the same as intrastate railroad rates affect and burden interstate commerce when they are too burdensome and may be regulated by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEENERSON) there were—ayes 16, noes 57.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the section.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to make a request?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to offer another amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to move to strike out the section, and I want to debate that.

Mr. TINCHER. Then I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will not the gentleman make that apply to all amendments except the motion to strike out, because we want debate on that?

Mr. TINCHER. Oh, no; that ought not to be debated at all. You might just as well move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] moves that debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. TINCHER) there were—ayes 69, noes 36.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum, and object to the vote on that ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote discloses the presence of a quorum. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] is recognized.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the last word in this section is "justice." It is well that occasionally throughout this bill we can find some provision of which something good can be said. There is not much else. But I want to move to strike it out because, judging from the rest of the bill, the word "justice" does not belong in the bill at all.

With that observation, I want to call attention to two different features of this bill. First there has been a great deal of talk here this afternoon about the evidence submitted to the committee in the hearings about manipulation and fluctuation of prices. Let us look at the table of contents of the hearings. First there is the statement of Mr. Chester Morrill, solicitor of the Department of Agriculture. He is the draftsman. What information could he give this committee upon the running of a grain exchange or the fluctuations of the market? He knows nothing of a practical character about that. If you will look at subdivision (f) in the next section you will certainly agree with me. No one can make any sense out of it. The next gentleman who appeared was Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. He could not give any information about the operations of the grain exchange and the conditions affecting market manipulations except from hearsay. Mr. Gates and Mr. Wells were the next two witnesses. Did they give any information of that character? Not a word. Then the hearings were closed with the statements of our colleagues Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. VOLSTEAD, who made no attempt to give testimony of that character to the committee. With this testimony the committee closed the hearings. Upon this testimony they predicate the recital of facts in section 3. But there were no facts before the committee to substantiate this recital.

Now, as to the question of manipulation: The chairman of the committee, my good friend from Kansas, tells us how the market has been grossly manipulated to the detriment of the farmer. We have a Department of Agriculture charged with the duty and responsibility of guarding against manipulation, and this Committee on Agriculture ought to have considerable influence with this Department of Agriculture. I will read from subsection (b) of section 6 of the futures trading act. It has been stated by one member of the committee that only one feature of the futures trading act was declared unconstitutional.

It says, "That if the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that any person is violating any of the provisions of this act or is attempting to manipulate the market price of any grain, in violation of section 5 hereof, or any rules or regulations," then the Secretary of Agriculture may proceed against such person or persons.

And yet this committee which comes before this Congress claiming to be such a great friend of the farmer and to have given this matter such careful, minute, and detailed consideration, with knowledge of manipulation costing the farmers millions of dollars, has failed to show those facts to the Secretary of Agriculture and get him to proceed in one single instance. Now, gentlemen, that only demonstrates that we have a bill prepared by Mr. Morrill, in the Department of Agriculture, hurriedly, then sent to the committee, speeded out of the committee for the purpose of getting it through the House so as to go to the country and talk about what we have done for the farmers, never minding if the Supreme Court throws it out again. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the word "to," insert the word "knowingly."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have had for nearly 20 years considerable to do with the postal legislation and legislation relating to postal offenses. We have closed the mails to all improper matter, and in every instance where there was a prohibition against the use of the mail it is stated in the statute that whoever knowingly uses the mail or deposits in the mail this thing and that thing the party is guilty. Here seems to be rather an inoccuous offense, if it be an offense, and you are going to make a man a criminal who does not know that what he is doing is wrong. If he deposits a letter handed to him by a stranger asking him to deposit it in the mail, he then literally makes himself a criminal. Are you going to make more drastic and extreme the prohibition against mailing matter in relation to business on the board of trade than you are the prohibition against obscene matter being deposited in the mail? Are you so anxious that you are going to condemn an entirely innocent person by saying that whoever deposits for delivery in the mail these letters that they are guilty of an offense and subject to a $10,000 fine and imprisonment for a year, or both?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman does not contend that a man who deposits in the mail a letter of the character that he describes is guilty, if he does not know what is in it?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly, under this bill—under no other law would he be guilty, but this is more drastic and stringent than any law that has ever been passed. I submit that the United States mail being the means of communication and intercourse, social and business, for the 100,000,000 of people, that you ought not to put such an outrageous statute on the books, because you might be doing a very great wrong to countless people who do not know anything about the matter condemned. The exception in regard to mailing and what is legal would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand. It is lawful if you are a member of a board of trade of a contract market, and it is unlawful if you are not. It is unlawful if you are a farmer and do not raise any grain; if you are a dairy farmer and deposit the letter giving market quotations on a board of trade, you are guilty; but if you are a farmer that raises the grain, or a member of a society of farmers that raise the grain, you can mail the letter. This law was not written in the Post Office Department. It was written by Mr. Morrill in the Agricultural Department, and all the explanation he gave us was that he inserted these provisions in place of the words of taxation in the former bill. He merely substituted the postal provisions for the taxing provisions of the former bill. Such provisions are tyrannical and an abuse of legislative power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEENERSON) there were 45 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey moves to strike out section 4.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I do not appear for any grain exchange, and I am not a dealer in futures, but I am going to speak for the farmers of Kansas, for the honest business men who buy their grain, and for the millers who buy of them.

Under this bill if any man goes down to the farmers of Kansas as a grain buyer, goes around among them and makes contracts by which he shall become a buyer in 10 days of 1,000 bushels of wheat here and 1,000 bushels of wheat there up to, say, 15,000 bushels of wheat that is a legal transaction, because he buys of the farmer, but if that same man wants to sell to the miller in Minneapolis and by telephone says to him, "Will you buy 15,000 bushels of grain from me in 15 days, pay me an advance upon it so that I can buy of these farmers," he is then subject to a fine of $10,000, because unless he is the "owner of the actual physical property" in the grain he can not make that contract of sale, unless he goes to a grain exchange and pays a commission there. He is not the "owner of the actual physical property" in grain by simply having made a contract to get it in 10 days. He is not the "owner of the actual physical property" at all until he buys this grain and gets the delivery of it, and much more if he secures his sale to the miller before he agrees with the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, this simply shows the danger of passing a bill which puts the monopoly of the grain business of this country in the hands of the grain exchanges. It is a thing that I should think every grain exchange would favor, because it turns every buyer and independent middleman out of business and forbids him to do any interstate business without going through a grain exchange. It is absolutely clear. It says that the contract shall be void unless the seller at the time of the making of such contract is the owner of the actual physical property covered thereby, or the grower thereof, or in a cooperative association, and he can only make his sale legal by the second clause which provides that it shall be legal where the contract is made by or through a member of a board of trade which has been designated as a contract market. The independent buyer of the grain, such as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] said he has been, if he wants to sell without going through a broker, whether to the mill, or to the exporter, or whatever it may be, is turned out of business, and he must go to a grain exchange, which has been approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of throwing the monopoly of any business in this country into the hands of a grain exchange. I saw no way to correct this section or I would have tried to do it. I can not provide for the various cases. I have named one. I submit that any bill which seeks to impose a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment in order to do business in this country should not be approved by this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey to strike out the section.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state to the committee that the gentleman from New Jersey is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He is not.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman says he is not. There is no prohibition in this bill against the man who is the owner of grain selling it for future delivery to anyone, and in the case which the gentleman from New Jersey described there would be no penalty attached.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman say that when a man has made a contract to buy grain 10 days from now, and to pay for it then, that he is the owner of it?

Mr. TINCHER. Oh, yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not agree with the gentleman. He is not the owner of the actual physical property.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey) there were—ayes 36, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein certain matter relative to the legislative situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain matter relative to the legislative situation. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would not cast the obloquy upon my colleague of suggesting that he should be more definite as to what he wishes to insert in the RECORD. Will he be kind enough to inform the committee more definitely?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. It is upon the work of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will this appear in the back of the RECORD?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to designate any board of trade as a "contract market" when, and only when, such board of trade complies with and carries out the following conditions and requirements:

(a) When located at a terminal market where cash grain of the kind specified in the contracts of sale of grain for future delivery to be executed on such board is sold in sufficient volumes and under such conditions as fairly to reflect the general value of the grain and the differences in value between the various grades of such grain, and where there is available to such board of trade official weighing and inspection service approved by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose.

(b) When the governing board thereof provides for the making and filing by the board or any member thereof, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, of reports in accordance with the rules and regulations, and in such manner and form and at such times as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, showing the details and terms of all transactions entered into by the board, or the members thereof, either in cash transactions consummated at, on, or in a board of trade, or transactions for future delivery, and when such governing board provides, in accordance with such rules and regulations, for the keeping of a record by the board or the members of the board of trade, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, showing the details and terms of all cash and future transactions entered into by them, consummated at, on, or in a board of trade, such record to be in permanent form, showing the parties to all such transactions, including the persons for whom made, any assignments or transfers thereof, with the parties thereto, and the manner in which said transactions are fulfilled, discharged, or terminated. Such record shall be required to be kept for a period of three years from the date thereof, or for a longer period if the Secretary of Agriculture shall so direct, and shall at all times be open to the inspection of any representative of the United States Department of Agriculture or United States Department of Justice.

(c) When the governing board thereof provides for the prevention of dissemination through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication, by the board or any member thereof, of false, misleading, or inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information or conditions that affect or tend to affect the price of grain in interstate commerce.

(d) When the governing board thereof provides for the prevention of manipulation of prices or the cornering of any grain by the dealers or operators upon such board.

(e) When the governing board thereof admits to membership in and all privileges on such board of trade, under such terms and conditions as may be imposed lawfully on other members of such board, any duly authorized representative of any lawfully formed and conducted cooperative association of producers having adequate financial responsibility which is engaged in cash grain business in interstate commerce: Provided, That no rule of a contract market against rebating commissions shall apply to the distribution of excess earnings among the bona fide members of any such cooperative association.

(f) When the governing board thereof provides for making such changes from time to time in the terms and conditions of the forms of contracts of sale to be executed on or subject to the rules of such board as may be necessary to remove or overcome any material prejudice or disadvantage to sellers or buyers thereof, found by the Secretary of Agriculture after investigation and public hearing and communicated by him to such board, which substantially affects the price or prices of such contracts so as to render them hazardous or unreliable as hedges or price bases for transactions in interstate commerce in cash grain or the products or by-products thereof.

(g) When the governing board provides for making effective the final orders or decisions entered pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (b) of section 6 of this act.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 6, line 3, strike out the words "That the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "The."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out paragraph (f) commencing with line 15, on page 8.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, there is another committee amendment at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment has not been offered by anybody. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois to offer a motion to amend. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 8, line 15, strike out all of paragraph (f).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will agree to this amendment. This paragraph, which relates to the form of contract on exchanges, is not an essential part of this bill at all and is so recognized by the friends of the bill. The matter has not been very well worked out. If it should develop hereafter that it is necessary to have this power it will be time enough to enact this legislation hereafter. Most of the gentlemen who have read this do not agree as to what it means. In my own judgment, expressed with some hesitation, if this paragraph remains in the bill the chances are that it would be held unconstitutional, and perhaps the other provisions of the section. I hope the amendment to strike out this will not be resisted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 14, after the word "official," strike out the word "weighing," and page 6, line 15, strike out the first word "and."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 22, after the word "misleading," strike out the words "or inaccurate," and before the word "misleading" insert the word "of."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, but the way the bill is written it would forbid the sending out an inaccurate report as to the condition of the market. Now, it is practically impossible to get an absolutely accurate report. Consider the Government reports—there are inaccuracies even in such reports, so that technically construed at least it would be forbidden to send out a Government report if there were any inaccuracies in it, which, of course, there necessarily would be. Of course, I suppose it would be construed that a matter which was not a substantial inaccuracy could not be material, but I do not see why such a provision should remain in the bill. If a statement sent out about the marketing of grain were misleading or false, the bill would still, under my amendment, condemn such a statement, so why put the word "inaccurate" into the bill, as it seems that without such word it would cover the ground sought.

As a matter of fact it is altogether desirable to have full market information distributed. All production is benefited by such distribution. Everyone wants to see the information generally diffused and distributed, and simply because there may be reports here that are inaccurate in some respects it does not seem to me they should be condemned so long as they are not false or misleading; at least the term "false and misleading," it seems to me, would govern in case of any substantial inaccuracy.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do.

Mr. HOCH. It does not seem to me this is a provision for penalizing the sending of an inaccurate report. This is simply one of the conditions which must be met in order to be designated a contract market.

Mr. JONES of Texas. A board could have its license taken away for sending out a Government report, because this is one of the conditions which the Secretary of Agriculture must levy before he designates the board a contract market. If he sent out a Government report therefore which is inaccurate, it seems to me, while he probably would not do it, he would have the authority to take away the designation as a contract market, and I do not believe he ought to have that authority.

Mr. HOCH. Does not this simply say that the governing board shall make provision to prevent dissemination of inaccurate reports?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. If they make the rule which forbids the sending out of any inaccurate reports, sending out any report that is not entirely accurate, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take away the designation. I believe the language should be "false and misleading." I believe the bill would be a better bill if the language were left there that should provide against the sending out of false and misleading information. We want this to be a practical bill. We want it to be an effective bill. I am fully convinced that the adoption of the amendment will be for the best interests of both the producer and the ultimate consumer.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAYTON. What is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the City Council of Cincinnati, Ohio, relative to the further improvement of the Ohio River.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the resolutions referred to:

Whereas the United States Government has already expended more than $60,000,000 in the improvement of the Ohio River; and

Whereas in its present uncompleted condition the actual experience of large shippers has shown a saving over the railroad rates of $2.50 per ton on steel shipments; and

Whereas the chamber of commerce of this city and the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, which has its headquarters in Cincinnati, have long urged the completion of this great project, which will benefit the entire Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the council of the city of Cincinnati, That Congress is hereby urged and petitioned to pass the pending appropriations for rivers and harbors and to take such other steps as may be necessary to complete the improvement of the Ohio River in order that the public may have the benefit of its use at the earliest possible time; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the Senators from Ohio and to the Representatives from this county.

In council of the city of Cincinnati, Tuesday, June 20, A. D. 1922.

Read and adopted.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have an amendment, striking out lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, that has been sent up to the desk, and I think that I should have the customary five minutes under the rules in which to present it to the House. It is an amendment that is embodied in the minority report, and it seems to me that we ought to be able to have at least time to discuss amendments that were submitted in the minority report to the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TINCHER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 64, noes 64.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether or not that motion precluded the offering of additional amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was not agreed to. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended on page 9, line 3, by striking out the letter "g" and inserting in lieu thereof the letter "f."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 9, line 3, strike out the letter "g" and insert in lieu thereof the letter "f."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the amendment has not been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota:
Page 8, line 11, after the word "commerce," strike out the proviso.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for the permission of certain grain exchanges under the regulation of the Secretary to operate a futures market. Now, subdivision (e), on page 8, contains one of those conditions.

I want to call specific attention to it.

When the governing board thereof admits to membership in and all privileges on such board of trade under such terms and conditions as may be imposed lawfully on other members of such board, any duly authorized representative of any lawfully formed and conducted cooperative association of producers having adequate financial responsibility which is engaged in cash grain business in interstate commerce: Provided—

It is this proviso I seek to strike out:

That no rule of a contract market against rebating commission shall apply to the distribution of excess earnings among the bona fide members of any such cooperative association.

Now, the membership upon these exchanges is necessarily subject to rules and regulations of the exchanges, and one of those rules is that there shall be no rebating of commissions by any member, and when any member of any exchange—I am speaking now of the usual course of business which has been prevalent for years—rebates a commission he can be hauled up before the governing board and expelled or otherwise disciplined.

Now, there is a very good reason for that. The members dealing upon the exchange deal with each other's property, and they handle large amounts of money. They must be financially responsible. The business is conducted upon a highly competitive basis, and the rebate of commissions makes for the same trouble that we get on any other proposition in which there is great public interest, and when the margin is small it makes for dishonest and sharp practices, so that universally these exchanges have prevented the rebating of commissions.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; I can not yield, I am sorry to say.

Now, then, since 12 years ago the cooperative concerns of farmers have had representation upon the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce. They have had it upon the same basis as any other concern. If reliable and honest, they are admitted to membership upon payment of membership fees. That is what this bill seeks to make general.

But, in addition to that, it provides that they can go in and go into this commission-rebating practice. An ordinary business man is prevented from indulging in this rebating practice. He has that law which is founded and based upon experience to prevent him from engaging in that practice, while the cooperative exchanges will be permitted to go ahead and rebate. Without this proviso they could pay their dividends at the end of the year to the members of their cooperative associations.

But the proponents of this bill are not satisfied with that. They want the rebating of commissions, and that makes for dishonesty.

Furthermore, this provision is of doubtful constitutionality. A similar provision met with the disapproval of the Supreme Court in the recent case. It is not a condition that relates directly to the regulation in interstate commerce of the transactions covered by this bill. The transactions themselves, which are regulated, are between persons defined in section 2 of this bill. Under that definition it is immaterial who may compose them. Under the purpose of this act it is not necessary that these various persons be associated or combined in any particular manner for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act. Any provision providing for it would be immaterial and not relate to the direct regulation of commerce which this act seeks to do. Under these circumstances any such attempt to define who may compose or the rights of such persons among themselves would be immaterial to the main purpose of regulating interstate commerce, and under these circumstances this relation and the action among themselves would be governed solely by the police power of the States and is not a necessary function of interstate commerce, and so such proviso should not be included in this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

In my judgment it is the only specific and definite provision in this subdivision. We find on line 6 of page 8 that cooperative associations may be admitted to an exchange under such conditions as may "lawfully" be imposed upon other members. There is no law relating to it. Nobody knows what is lawful in that respect or what is unlawful. There is absolutely no law governing the association or the exchange in this respect, no law governing the admission of members to an association. That word "lawful" has no meaning whatever. There is little, if any, meaning to anything in the subdivision until the proviso is reached, and the proviso gives the only protection a cooperative association or a grain exchange has in the matter of membership. The proviso will not operate as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] says. It will not permit the distribution or return of commissions to anyone with whom the cooperative association may do business; such association will be permitted to return excess earnings, and only to its own bona fide members. It provides that the association shall not be refused admission if it distributes its excess earnings only—notice the word "only"—among the bona fide members of such association.

The testimony before the committee was to the effect that the present operations of these cooperative associations were objectionable only when they went out and sought business and took business from others than bona fide members of the association and then remitted or reduced its charges to these outsiders. There was no objection whatever to their existence and no objection to their operation if they operate as this proviso would require. There was no objection whatever to the admission of an association that distributes its profits or earnings among the bona fide members of the corporation, just as is set forth in line 11. That proviso in my judgment ought not to be stricken out.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This provision, as the gentleman knows, was in the original act. Did not Mr. Wells testify, when the matter of the farmers' organization was up before, that he thought it would be adjusted and worked out satisfactorily?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Wells testified that the objection to the cooperative associations was when they went outside their membership and sought business from anybody whom they could reach, and they had a way of returning the charges and commissions to outsiders. He testified that there was no objection whatever on this score to the admission of cooperative associations if the cooperative associations returned only their profits or excess earnings and only among the bona fide members of the association.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I want five minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not know what the committee want to do. I move to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois) there were—ayes 74, noes 22.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota) there were—ayes 43, noes 75.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois: Amend section 5, paragraph 3, line 18, page 6, by striking out the words "before or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes to explain the purpose of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HERRICK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any board of trade desiring to be designated a "contract market" shall make application to the Secretary of Agriculture for such designation and accompany the same with a showing that it complies with the above conditions and with a sufficient assurance that it will continue to comply with the above requirements.

(a) A commission composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General is authorized to suspend for a period not to exceed six months or to revoke the designation of any board of trade as a "contract market" upon a showing that such board of trade has failed or is failing to comply with any of the above requirements or is not enforcing its rules of government made a condition of its designation as set forth in section 5. Such suspension or revocation shall only be after a notice to the officers of the board of trade affected and upon a hearing: Provided, That such suspension or revocation shall be final and conclusive unless within 15 days after such suspension or revocation by the said commission such board of trade appeals to the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which it has its principal place of business by filing with the clerk of such court a written petition praying that the order of the said commission be set aside or modified in the manner stated in the petition, together with a bond in such sum as the court may determine, conditioned that such board of trade will pay the costs of the proceedings if the court so directs. The clerk of the court in which such a petition is filed shall immediately cause a copy thereof to be delivered to the Secretary of Agriculture, chairman of said commission, or any member thereof, and the said commission shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in the court a full and accurate transcript of the record in such proceedings, including the notice to the board of trade, a copy of the charges, the evidence, and the report and order. The testimony and evidence taken or submitted before the said commission, duly certified and filed as aforesaid as a part of the record, shall be considered by the court as the evidence in the case. The proceedings in such cases in the circuit court of appeals shall be made a preferred cause and shall be expedited in every way. Such a court may affirm or set aside the order of the said commission or may direct it to modify its order. No such order of the said commission shall be modified or set aside by the circuit court of appeals unless it is shown by the board of trade that the order is unsupported by the weight of the evidence or was issued without due notice and a reasonable opportunity having been afforded to such board of trade for a hearing, or infringes the Constitution of the United States, or is beyond the jurisdiction of said commission: Provided further, That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall refuse to designate as a contract market any board of trade that has made application therefor, then such board of trade may appeal from such refusal to the commission described therein, consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General of the United States, with the right to appeal as provided for in other cases in this section, the decision on such appeal to be final and binding on all parties interested.

(b) That if the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that any person is violating any of the provisions of this act or is attempting to manipulate the market price of any grain in violation of the provisions of section 5 hereof or of any of the rules or regulations made pursuant to its requirements he may serve upon such person a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached or contained therein a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place not less than three days after the service thereof, requiring such person to show cause why an order should not be made directing that all contract markets until further notice of the said commission refuse all trading privileges thereon to such person. Said hearing may be held in Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, before the said commission or before a referee designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall cause all evidence to be reduced to writing and forthwith transmit the same to the Secretary of Agriculture as chairman of the said commission. That for the purpose of securing effective enforcement of the provisions of this act the provisions, including penalties, of section 12 of the interstate commerce act, as amended, relating to the attendance and testimony of witnesses, the production of documentary evidence, and the immunity of witnesses, are made applicable to the power, jurisdiction, and authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, the said commission, or said referee in proceedings under this act, and to persons subject to its provisions. Upon evidence received the said commission may require all contract markets to refuse such person all trading privileges thereon for such period as may be specified in said order. Notice of such order shall be sent forthwith by registered mail or delivered to the offending person and to the governing boards of said contract markets. After the issuance of the order by the commission, as aforesaid, the person against whom it is issued may obtain a review of such order or such other equitable relief as to the court may seem just by filing in the United States circuit court of appeals of the circuit in which the petitioner is doing business a written petition praying that the order of the commission be set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the commission by delivering such copy to its chairman or to any member thereof, and thereupon the commission shall forthwith certify and file in the court a transcript of the record theretofore made, including evidence received. Upon the filing of the transcript the court shall have jurisdiction to affirm, to set aside, or modify the order of the commission, and the findings of the commission as to the facts, if supported by the weight of evidence, shall in like manner be conclusive. In proceedings under paragraphs (a) and (b) the judgment and decree of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court upon certiorari, as provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 9, line 6, strike out the words "that any" and insert the word "Any."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 11, line 14, strike out the words "that if" and insert the word "If."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the first word in line 12, on page 13, is correct. I do not know what "bv" stands for.

Mr. SNELL. B. v. d.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Perhaps it should be b. v. d.

Mr. TINCHER. The word is "by."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I ask unanimous consent that the spelling of the word "by," in line 12, page 13, be corrected by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Clerk will be instructed to correct the spelling of the word.

There was no objection.

Mr. HIMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some correspondence bebtween Mr. Gilbert, Undersecretary of the Treasury, and others relative to H. R. 4576, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS. Reserving the right to object, on what subject is that?

Mr. HIMES. The bill is with reference to providing for legal-tender notes secured by noninterest-bearing 25-year bonds of State or subdivisions of States.

Mr. STEPHENS. May I ask the gentleman if he is personally interested in the communications?

Mr. HIMES. I am asking that these be inserted in the RECORD in order to accommodate a constituent.

Mr. STEPHENS. May I ask the length of the communications?

Mr. HIMES. I should say about 20 typewritten pages.

Mr. STEPHENS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That any board of trade that has been designated a contract market in the manner herein provided may have such designation vacated and set aside by giving notice in writing to the Secretary of Agriculture requesting that its designation as a contract market be vacated, which notice shall be served at least 90 days prior to the date named therein as the date when the vacation of designation shall take effect. Upon receipt of such notice the Secretary of Agriculture shall forthwith order the vacation of the designation of such board of trade as a contract market, effective upon the day named in the notice, and shall forthwith send a copy of the notice and his order to all other contract markets. From and after the date upon which the vacation became effective the said board of trade can thereafter be designated again a contract market by making application to the Secretary of Agriculture in the manner herein provided for an original application.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 13, line 18, strike out the words "that any" and insert the word "any" with a capital A.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act, and in order to provide information for the use of Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture may make such investigations as he may deem necessary to ascertain the facts regarding the operations of boards of trade, whether prior or subsequent to the enactment of this act, and may publish from time to time, in his discretion, the result of such investigation and such statistical information gathered therefrom as he may deem of interest to the public, except data and information which would separately disclose the business transactions of any person and trade secrets or names of customers: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from making or issuing such reports as he may deem necessary relative to the conduct of any board of trade or of the transactions of any person found guilty of violating the provisions of this act under the proceedings prescribed in section 6 of this act: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture in any report may include the facts as to any actual transaction. The Secretary of Agriculture, upon his own initiative or in cooperation with existing governmental agencies, shall investigate marketing conditions of grain and grain products and by-products, including supply and demand for these commodities, cost to the consumer, and handling and transportation charges. He shall likewise compile and furnish to producers, consumers, and distributers, by means of regular or special reports, or by such methods as he may deem most effective, information respecting the grain markets, together with information on supply, demand, prices, and other conditions in this and other countries that affect the markets.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 14, line 10, strike out the words "that for" and insert the word "for," with a capital F.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, known as the grain futures act, proposes to lodge with the Secretary of Agriculture a supervisory power over the business methods of the grain exchanges of the Nation. Its provisions will be effective in all terminal markets transacting a sufficient volume of cash grain business to reflect the general values of grain. In order to do interstate business these markets must adopt regulations to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and each of them must obtain designation from the department as a contract market.

Legislation of this kind has been repeatedly suggested in the past. As far back as I can remember there has been complaint among the farmers, the millers, and the consumers about the manipulation of grain prices by questionable methods in the great markets. A steadfast belief has prevailed that grain prices have been artificially stimulated and depressed, with little regard for the law of supply and demand. Evidence before our committee proves that on frequent occasions false information concerning crop conditions and other price elements have been circulated for the purpose of affecting market quotations. The grain trading centers through which the bread supply of the Nation must pass from the farmer to the miller, and then on to the consumer, have a function to perform that is of vital interest to every citizen. They have become public-service institutions, and it is the duty of the Government to see that their powers are not used to the detriment of public welfare.

A bill very similar to this one became a law in August, 1921, and remained in effect until May, 1922, when it was declared unconstitutional for the reason that its regulatory power was based upon a scheme of taxation. The Supreme Court, in annulling the law, denied the right of Congress to accomplish the purpose desired through taxation; but the court suggested, however, that the same result could be obtained by basing the regulatory power upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. This bill, therefore, is substantally intended to reenact a law under which we have 10 months of recent experience. During the 10 months this law was in operation there was less price manipulation than through any other equal period in recent years; but within 30 days after the law ceased to function there was a drop in the market price of wheat of 40 cents a bushel.

Under the pending measure the grain exchanges and their members will be forbidden to disseminate by wire or mail or otherwise any false or misleading reports calculated to produce price fluctuations. On the other hand, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to compile and furnish to producers, consumers, and distributors comprehensive information respecting markets and crop conditions, supply and demand; and such other intelligence as should properly determine price levels.

More actual wheat is bought and sold in Chicago than in any other American market; but the actual cash grain, whether for present or future delivery, is insignificant as compared with the speculative trading in fictitious futures. The average American wheat crop is something less than a billion bushels per year. The amount of future trading in wheat on the Chicago market alone exceeds 10,000,000,000 bushels. In addition to the Chicago market there are a half a dozen other grain exchanges in the country dealing in cash wheat and futures. The fact is that in the great bulk of future trading no delivery is ever contemplated. The seller of the imaginary wheat is simply betting that the price quotations will fall, and the buyer is betting that the price will rise, before the future delivery date. When the time comes to close the transaction the difference, whether up or down, is paid by the loser. Men who never in their lives have had a bushel of actual wheat in their physical possession have dealt in millions of bushels of fictitious wheat. Men who have no wheat sell thousands of bushels of it never intending to make delivery, and men who want no wheat buy thousands of bushels never expecting to receive a single pound.

On the floor of the exchange the real owners of the wheat sell it to good-faith purchasers, and on the same floor market manipulators are buying and selling futures on wheat that never did and never will exist. It is here that dealers fix the prices to be paid the farmer for his grain. Just how far the market is manipulated by speculators more deeply concerned about the price of fictitious futures than about the value of actual wheat no one can tell. Just how far the market is affected by the dissemination of false reports concerning supply and demand and crop conditions is not known. But it would be unreasonable to presume that the various sinister influences surrounding the grain trade are wholly without effect. That the even flow of wheat from the farmer's granary to the miller's elevator is not burdened and obstructed in some measure by operators on the exchange is unbelievable. But the extent of the evil influence is not known, because under the system prevailing for a lifetime no records have been kept by any of the exchanges concerning their transactions.

This bill provides that every contract market shall make a memorandum of every business transaction and retain it for three years, so that the same may be examined or reviewed at any time by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Justice. By having at hand this information, which has never been available heretofore, it is presumed that the Secretary of Agriculture may be able to determine what class of deals amount to legitimate business and what class of them have the effect of price manipulation. Somewhere in the twilight zone between business investment and gambling manipulation a line should be drawn to determine what class of these wheat deals fall within the realm of legitimate enterprise and what class should bear the odiom of market betting. No Government agency heretofore has been empowered to turn the light on this hazy and uncertain region. The exchanges, preferring the darkness of secrecy rather than the light of publicity, have kept no records, and no Government agency has had authority to require the keeping of records. No means have been available whereby any branch of the Government could inquire or obtain information as to how prices had been manipulated in the bread supply of the Nation. It is intended that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power to know in detail just how American grain dealing is carried on. He will be able to know what it is that obstructs and burdens the flow of the grain from the producer to the consumer. He will be able to know whether the economic law of supply and demand is violated, and whether market jugglers are manipulating prices. He will be able to analyze the various elements constituting the spread in price between what the farmer gets for his wheat and what the consumer pays for his flour. With all of this knowledge available to the Secretary of Agriculture we are hopeful that he may be able to remove the present hindrances to grain traffic.

When the governing board of any exchange shall permit its members to disseminate misleading reports calculated to effect grain prices, or when the trading records required by law or by regulation are not kept, or are withheld from the Secretary of Agriculture, or where practices are indulged in with a view to manipulating prices or cornering the market, then such contract market shall be suspended from operation or its designation as a contract market may be revoked, according to the degree of guilt.

If this bill becomes a law, its supervisory effect will extend only to interstate transactions; it will in no wise touch such transactions as are purely intrastate. It will offer no interference to those who buy and sell cash wheat for actual delivery, present or future, because it is not designed to restrain or hinder cash transactions. The sole purpose of the bill is to correct the evils in that class of trading known as futures where grain is bought for presumable delivery at a future date, when in fact no delivery at all is contemplated. If it were a mere matter of betting on the rise or fall of the market between the manipulator on the inside and the sucker on the outside, Congress would not perhaps be concerned about it. But these enormous transactions going on every day are bound to reflect an influence on the price received by the grower of the grain. Likewise the price of wheat to the miller and the price of flour to the consumer are largely determined by the caprice and fluctuations of the price quotations on the floor of the exchange.

The natural demand for wheat is measured by the amount of bread that is consumed from day to day. The artificial demand for wheat is measured by the number of bushels sold on the market in future trading. In every other class of business the cost of production and the consent of the producer are factors in determining the price for which a thing shall be sold. But it is not so with wheat. When the farmer drives to the market with a load of grain he must accept the offer of the buyer or keep the wheat. When he crosses the street to spend his money he must pay the price the merchant proposes. The grower of the grain has had nothing to do with determining the price for which he sold it. Moreover, it is impossible for him to analyze the elements that determine the price of his crop. He knows what it cost him to produce the crop, and he can ascertain with reasonable certainty the available supply of grain and can estimate the probable demand, but his knowledge of the other price factors is too murky for analysis.

The framers of this bill are of the opinion that the price puzzle may be solved by encouraging the growers of the grain in the practice of cooperative marketing. The bill provides that every exchange designated as a contract market shall admit to membership cooperative associations of producers. Certain boards of trade in the past have admitted these associations to membership, but have imposed a rule upon them which prohibits the rebating or splitting of commissions. They have never permitted such an association to become a member unless that association agreed to distribute its profits upon the basis of the capital invested by its members. The cooperative associations prefer to distribute their profits, not upon the basis of capital invested but upon a patronage or earning basis. In considering the bill in committee we were of the opinion that the exchanges should admit these associations to membership, and that the associations should be permitted to distribute their profits according to their own rules without dictation from the grain exchange. I regard this cooperative marketing provision as one of the most commendable features of the bill.

The framers of the bill have not sought to put any restrictions on legitimate hedging by men who have bought or sold grain in good faith for future delivery and who are merely seeking an insurance protection against adverse market fluctuations. It is conceded that the hedging privilege should not be destroyed. The hedge is an insurance against an unexpected change in price. The hedge affords safety to traders, and by reason of that safety they are usually able to secure a degree of financial backing that no bank would extend without the hedge protection.

Our committee has held extensive hearings on the features of this bill during the last two years. We have heard the views of agricultural associations and the individual farmer; we have listened patiently for days to representatives of grain exchanges; we have counseled with the millers and with representatives of the consuming public; and after the most careful and painstaking consideration we have concluded that this bill will work no injury whatever to the legitimate business of marketing grain. On the other hand, we are of the opinion that many of the disadvantages that now beset the consumer and the producer will be eliminated. We have tried to abolish that system of price gambling and market manipulating that has resulted so frequently in pulling down the price of grain at the season when the farmer sells his wheat and boosting it upward after it has been acquired by the speculator. If this bill results in giving the organized farmers of America a voice in fixing the price of their product, it will be one of the crowning achievements of the present Congress.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 3, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, why should it be left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to make a report of the actual transactions instead of making it mandatory?

Mr. TINCHER. Because it would make an extraordinary expense to compel the Secretary to publish this in every transaction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think it is in the interest of economy. It would entail an enormous expense if he has to set out the facts in every instance.

Mr. SEARS. I agree with the gentleman; I think we should act in the interest of economy. I have heard the slogan, "Put less Government into business and more business into Government." This was evidently one of the many usual ways of fooling the people, and only for the purpose of getting votes. No one can tell what this is going to cost. The Secretary of Agriculture will become supreme; he can go into a man's business, and he will have a regular army of officers going around over the country. The people are very "enthusiastic" about having Government agents come into their place of business and check them up. I have no complaint to make as to the present Secretary, and no doubt we will always have a high-class man filling said position. But it so often happens that their subordinates are dictatory and do not use judgment or discretion. However, Mr. Chairman, it is now almost impossible to secure a Pullman berth because of the army of employees traveling at the expense of the taxpayer, and perhaps a few more will make it impossible for those not in the Government to travel except in day coaches, and in this may make the measure one of economy.

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman think that that is all right—that the people have lost all power of self-government?

Mr. SEARS. I agree with the gentleman that apparently the people have lost all idea of self-control and self-government and want the Government to look after them. I think my good friends ought to go carefully before they go far in paternalism, and especially such as provided in this bill. Further, to my mind at least, this bill, like the one the Supreme Court has passed upon, will be declared unconstitutional. Certainly it is a matter which can only be controlled by the State, and as you can not do in law by indirection a thing which you can not do directly, and if I am correct in the above the Supreme Court can only declare the law unconstitutional regardless of their personal desires or wishes. I believe we must have some regulations, but I am not willing, nor will I vote for a proposition, feeling as I do, as stated above.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any person who shall violate the provisions of section 4 of this act, or who shall fail to evidence any contract mentioned in said section by a memorandum in writing as therein required, or who shall knowingly or carelessly deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication false, misleading, or inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information or conditions that affect or tend to affect the price of grain in interstate commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 15, line 16, strike out the words "that any" and insert the word "any," with a capital A.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "or carelessly."

[Mr. HILL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to know if we are going to conduct a night school here on law practice.

Mr. KNUTSON. We need some instruction, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota:

Page 15, line 24, strike out the words "that affect or tend to affect" and insert in lieu thereof the words "with the intent of affecting."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, section 9 is the penalty provision of the bill, and during all of this discussion as to whether a man is guilty of a misdemeanor or a felony I could not help but think of the penalty that is attached here. The penalty provided for is one year's imprisonment or a fine of $10,000, or both. What difference does it make to the poor devil who is in the cell whether we call it a misdemeanor or a felony? Here is what we are doing by this provision: We say that the man who carelessly delivers for transmission in the mails or in interstate commerce, through wire or wireless, any false, misleading, or any inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information shall be guilty, etc. One or two years ago the Department of Agriculture circulated a very inaccurate and erroneous report in reference to crop conditions in this country. That report was printed in all of the newspapers of the country. It was relied upon. It was inaccurate. It was misleading, and grossly so. Yet any person buying one of the papers that carried that report and sending it out through inadvertence could be haled before a United States court and have imposed upon him a fine of $10,000 or one year's imprisonment, or both. It is not necessary to prove that the man intended to do the thing.

If he did it carelessly or otherwise, but with the intention of affecting the price of grain, something might be said for the provision; but in line 24 it will be noted that the intent to affect the price is lacking. The provision is that it will affect or tend to affect the price of grain. My amendment seeks to provide that before a man can be penalized $10,000 or one year's imprisonment, or both, he shall at least be found to have had an intention to affect the price of grain. I am wondering if the committee will not yield to a reasonable amendment of this kind.

Mr. TINCHER. No.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I thought not. I am not surprised. I did not expect anything of the kind.

Mr. LONDON rose.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. If the editor or publisher of an agricultural journal should happen to be mistaken in his opinion or prognostication of the situation he would be liable to a fine?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman from New York has stated it accurately. Not only would the publisher be liable but the office boy who put it in the envelope.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota) there were—ayes 52, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 3, after the word "both," strike out the rest of the line and insert a period after the word "both."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. May we have unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the general purpose of this bill I shall support. I shall vote for the bill. I know that the members of the committee do not consider themselves infallible. Here is a provision that a man, if convicted, may be fined $10,000; that the imprisonment can be for a year; and, third, the court can impose both fine and imprisonment, namely, $10,000 and one year in prison. Then, irrespective of the willfulness of the offense, which will have a tendency of preventing conviction, we add the following: "Together with the costs of prosecution." I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if on technical evidence a man is brought before the court, it will have a tendency to defeat a conviction because of the very large expense you may have incurred by the prosecution, besides all the other penalties. We want to be reasonable. It is the certainty and not the severity of punishment that counts. Now, it is mandatory in addition to the fine that the court must of necessity impose the costs in regard to the prosecution of the trial of the case.

Mr. TINCHER. Ordinarily the costs follow the prosecution——

Mr. RAKER. No; ordinarily it is the reverse.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman think if we are going to deal with these exchanges that we ought to take any chances?

Mr. RAKER. I think it makes little difference as to the question of the offense. The legislature, in its judgment, fixes the extent of the punishment. The court then, in its judgment, according to the evidence adduced, after the jury has found the defendant guilty or he had pleaded guilty, determines within the limit fixed by the legislature as to the punishment that should be meted out to the defendant.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, the costs follow in the better States.

Mr. RAKER. It does not follow.

Mr. TINCHER. I said in the better States, where they have the best laws.

Mr. RAKER. No; a greater number do not in the Federal courts, and the same may be said as to most of the States. You fix in the statute what a felony is and what is the punishment and what a misdemeanor is and its punishment. If you can impose a penalty of $10,000 and a year in jail, my goodness, what more do you want? Just simply because there is a sentiment for enforcing the law in this particular matter do not overdo it. You have three penalties, the third being, namely, that of imposing the costs of the prosecution by the court in all cases. Mandatory. There is no reason or justification for this last proviso, which I have moved to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That if any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 16, line 4, strike out the words "That if" and insert in lieu thereof the word "If."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no fine or imprisonment shall be imposed for any violation of this act occurring before the first day of the second month following its passage.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 16, line 9, strike out the words "That no" and insert the word "No."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY of Illinois:

Section 11, page 16, line 11, strike out the word "second" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourth."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], I wish to state that I ask this to be four months instead of two months, so as to give the exchanges an opportunity——

Mr. TINCHER. They have already had an opportunity, and they are complying to a considerable extent with this law. It does not take them any two months or four months to comply with it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not my colleague realize that that postpones by two months the imposition of a possible fine of $10,000 and a possible imprisonment for one year for carelessly mailing a letter? That certainly would not do.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. I thought possibly that I could get the gentleman from Kansas to look at it more reasonably.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of Agriculture may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person; and shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, not in conflict with existing law, and make such expenditures for rent outside the District of Columbia, printing, telegrams, telephones, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to the administration of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for such purposes.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Page 16, line 12, strike out the words "That the" and insert the word "The."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11843, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on my amendment to lines 19 and 20, on page 15, by striking out the words "or carelessly."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment called for by the gentleman from Maryland was not adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "That this" and insert in lieu thereof the word "This."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 177, noes 4.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees. Those in favor of agreeing to the amendment will as their names are called answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 255, nays 7, not voting 168, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?
There was no objection.
Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on the tariff.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?
There was no objection.
The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, the greatest if not the sole issue between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party to-day is the tariff issue. It has been the outstanding issue since the beginning of our Government almost, and has had the best thought and deepest study of America's ablest statesmen. The Republican Party has consistently stood for the protective-tariff policy, and the Democratic Party for the free-trade or tariff-for-revenue-only policy. The Northern and Eastern States have been and are principally manufacturing States, while the South and West have engaged chiefly in agriculture. The former States have always been in competition with the European manufacturer, but until recent years the farmer and the stockman, the producer of raw material, had no foreign competition at all, because there was little, if any, importation of raw material. Before the war the South had its cheap slave labor and the West its cheap and fertile virgin land, limitless in area.

The agriculturist was only concerned in finding an export market for his surplus products, for he had no cause to worry about competition from without. Naturally he was not interested in placing restrictions or prohibitions against the importations of agricultural products that were not being imported anyhow, and it likewise appeared to him natural, fair, and proper, though admittedly selfish, to oppose a protective tariff upon manufactures, which he did not produce and sell, but which he used and had to buy. Had conditions been reversed—the South a manufacturing section, and the North agricultural—undoubtedly the South would have favored the protective policy and the North opposed it; or if in the past, had the manufacturers of the North been free and exempt from foreign competition, and the agricultural products of the South subjected to outside competition, we may be sure that the northern manufacturers would have been the free trader and the farmer of the South the protectionist. Selfish personal interest will probably always control human actions, and where interests vary according to sections of the country, we naturally have sectional policies, and that means sectional politics.

But the conditions of the past are not the conditions of to-day. A great change has taken place in the productive businesses of this Nation. The farmer of the South and West no longer has the American market to himself, but is forced to compete at home with an enormous influx of farm, ranch, and dairy products from South America, Australia, Asia, Africa, Europe, in fact, from all parts and corners of the earth.

The producer of raw material is now in exactly the same position with reference to foreign competition in which the manufacturer has always been in this country. True, neither of these great industries—manufacture and agriculture—at this time may be in the strict sense "infant industries" that need the "wet nurse" of protection. They are, however, due to abnormal world conditions, very "sick industries" and need the care and ministrations of both physician and nurse and safe and sane doses of the helpful and strengthening tonic of Republican protection. A sick adult needs the services of nurse and physician quite as much as does the infant. On account of this changed condition whereby the farmer and the stockman finds himself occupying the same position with regard to foreign competition as the manufacturer, the tariff question has ceased to be sectional and has become a national problem, affecting the South and West in the same degree as the North and East, and the question ought to be, must be, discussed and solved in a broad and comprehensive way, patriotically, and from the broad American standpoint.

If I am correct in the statement that farm, ranch, and dairy products can be supplied to the American market by the foreign producer at prices greatly less than the same products can be placed upon the American market by our own farmers, ranchmen, and dairymen, then clearly the protective tariff policy of the Republican Party applies with as much force to those raw products as to the finished article of the manufacturer.

The Republican Party is recognizing the application of the policy to the products of the South, and the Democratic Party will be forced by its own adherents to meet the issue fairly and squarely, and not evasively as heretofore. It ought to be easy for Americans of every class, of every section, whether farmer or manufacturer, to meet upon the common ground of saving the American market to the American producer, and not to surrender it to the foreign producer and the foreign laborer. With such a surrender goes American prosperity and American commercial independence. It is indeed a pleasing prospect that at this present time the tariff may be discussed from the national point of view, and for the first time in the history of our Republic sectional appeal to sectional selfishness is as inappropriate as it is senseless. We have a common interest, a common cause, and we must stand together or fall together. We are forced to abandon a sectional policy and adopt a national policy of protection. The protective-tariff policy is an American policy, although I admit it is a selfish policy, but being American I am willing to stand charged with a national selfishness that means the preservation of American prosperity, American ideals, American standards of living, and the American scale of wages.

I shall not attempt to burden the RECORD with a mass of statistical information, but briefly to present and discuss the fundamentals of this great and vital question, and their application to current conditions. When I use the term "raw material" I use it in its general sense as including farm and ranch products as distinguished from manufactured products, recognizing that in the strict sense there are no raw materials that are not the result of labor, and that what is raw material to the manufacturer is the finished product of the farmer. It is also true that the capital of to-day is the labor of yesterday. All wealth practically is the product of labor. Labor produces from the ground the raw material and converts that into a more finished product, adding to its usefulness and to its value. Because labor produces nearly all wealth, prime consideration should be given to its protection and its encouragement and reward in devising any legislative plan to bring about commercial prosperity. Wealth being the product of labor, whatever benefits the product benefits its producer, and whatever injures one injures the other. The workman in the factory, field, or mine depends upon the successful and profitable operation of the enterprise for his own success. These truths are axiomatic.

The American workman enjoys a higher wage scale and has become accustomed to a better standard of living than the foreign workman. His wages are in many cases more than twice as high as the European laborer; and his living expenses, due to comforts he enjoys, are greatly in excess of his foreign competitor who turns out the same or similar products. It follows, therefore, that the foreign producer, manufacturer, or farmer employing cheap labor can produce the same article much cheaper abroad than it can be produced in this country. This being true, what is the solution? The Democratic theory is to permit foreign goods to enter American markets without imposing any restriction on their importation by way of tariff levies, with the inevitable result of accomplishing one of two things, as follows: First, either to drive the American producer out of the particular competitive business, close the factory, field, or ranch, and discharge the labor, and engage in some other productive enterprise; or, second, to reduce the cost of production to the foreign cost of production by reducing wages down to the foreign wage scale. In other words, the Democratic theory is to permit foreign goods an equal opportunity in the American market with the American goods and force the American producer to either quit the particular productive enterprise he is engaged in or force him to reduce wages of his employees to such an extent that he may be able to compete with the foreign producer. Certainly no one should seriously and bluntly advocate the degradation of American labor to the low standards of foreign countries, and neither ought any right-thinking, straight-thinking American statesman favor surrendering American production to foreign production. But the free trade or any other nonprotective tariff policy forces us to either one or the other of the above alternative courses, and I challenge the successful contradiction of the statement.

The foreign competitive field of production covers almost every American productive enterprise, and therefore the free-trade suggestion that if the American producer of a particular product can not meet the lower production costs of his foreign competitor he should quit that business and engage in another holds out no hope or promise, because the foreigner to-day competes with us in every line of manufacture, every class of agriculture. We have arrived at a point where we can retreat no longer, but must now stand our ground or surrender all to foreign industrial invasion. Every partial surrender makes surer our ultimate complete capitulation. The putting into practice of such a political theory would make of us a nation of nonproducers of wealth, our factories would close, our fields lie idle, and our labor without employment.

Free traders hold out the cold comfort to the American consumer that although the American product was not to be had the foreign product would be still available and at a cheaper price, but how would that opportunity profit the American consumer when he is without the financial means to buy? Money is not wealth, but only the measure of wealth, and wealth is the fruit of productive labor, and however cheap foreign goods might be a moneyless consuming public would still go hungry and unclothed. But not only will the surrender of American production to foreign production and the consequent surrender of the American market to the foreigner mean loss of American wealth production and diminished buying capacity, but it will not finally result in cheap foreign goods to the American consumer.

Until, and for the purpose of destroying by underselling the American producer, the foreign goods will be sold cheaper. But when American productive competition is destroyed and the American market is at the mercy of foreigners and American importers, is there anyone so gullible as to believe that the American consumer will not be forced to pay all that can be forced out of him? I know of no good reason that inspires the hope that the American consumer can expect greater consideration at the hands of foreign producers than from American producers. We have at least some legislative governmental control of our own citizens, we can make some effort to control American corporations, trusts, and monopolies, but what preventive or remedial action could we take against foreign machinations designed to fleece the American consumer? Is it not reasonable to assume that after American production is destroyed foreign manufacturers would combine to extort from their American buyers all the commerce would bear? Admitting the difficulties we encounter in curbing the greed of American monopolies, must we not further admit that we would be absolutely helpless as against foreign monopolistic combinations? They would not be subject to our laws. If the comforts and necessities of American life came only from foreign sources we would be subject to foreign power, and even if we had laws, those laws would be safely defied, for how could we enforce a law against foreigners who could withhold from us the very means of existence? I repeat that the operation of the free-trade policy would, in the course of time, mean commercial slavery to the United States. Of course, the American people would not permit the continuance of such a policy long enough to reduce America to such a hopeless and helpless condition, but the logic of the free-trade policy or any tariff-for-revenue-only policy inevitably leads to the conclusion that that very condition of commercial and national servitude will result if continued long enough.

The history of every free-trade tariff law enacted shows clearly the tendency toward that condition. The present Democratic Underwood tariff law, which went into effect late in 1913, is only an apparent, and not a real, exception to the rule. Everyone conversant with business conditions during the latter part of 1913 and the first six months of 1914 knows the paralyzing effect of that law on industry and labor. We know that soup houses were opened to take the place of factories that had been closed; that 3,000,000 men were put out of employment, and conditions growing steadily worse; that the farmer's cotton that cost 15 cents to produce fell to 6 cents per pound, and then suddenly in July, 1914, the World War broke out and imports from foreign countries to America ceased and American exports increased. But for the World War unquestionably conditions would have grown so bad that even a Democratic Congress would have repealed the Underwood tariff law, and the tariff question would have been settled in this country forever. No political party in our lifetime would have again proposed a free trade or other nonprotective tariff laws. The war saved the Democratic Party for a time. The war served the same purpose in checking foreign imports that a protective tariff serves in time of peace. The first eight months of the operation of the Underwood law shows what may be expected of a nonprotective tariff law under normal conditions, and I am confident that American business and American labor is not anxious for another such showing.

From what I have said, it follows that we must look to some other political party than the Democratic and to some other policy than a free-trade or nonprotective policy if we would secure a decent wage to the American workman and a fair price to the American producer in the American market. I have tried to present fairly the fundamentals of the free-trade policy; and for obvious reasons, what can be said by way of criticism of the free-trade policy applies equally but in lesser degree to a tariff for revenue only, so far as the protective feature is concerned. Quite recently in the South a new class of tariff Democrats have appeared. They profess to believe in a tariff that gives "incidental protection" but oppose a protective tariff. It is difficult to understand just what they mean, but we do know that this is a partial confession of the unsoundness of their party's tariff policy, and we further know that this is a complete surrender to an urgent demand of their thinking constituents who are demanding a protective tariff. They might as well now as later fully confess the error of their ways, drop the "incidental," and advocate just plain, everyday American protection, as represented by the Republican Party. The protective-tariff sentiment is growing rapidly in all parts of the South. It does not make a great deal of difference whether the protection is termed "incidental" or whether it arises "incidentally" from the rate of duties fixed, so long as it results in protection. That only is important. It is a hopeful sign that the "incidental protectionists" and the real Republican protectionists are getting so close together. They are seeking the same light and are approaching common ground from which this great problem of governmental policy may be discussed and finally solved, and from a national standpoint.

There is another class of tariff advocates who are even less frank and sincere than the "incidental" protectionists. They are not for a "tariff for revenue only" but for a "tariff for office only." They do not belong to the ranks of those Democrats who honestly oppose a tariff for protection. They are simply politicians without the courage of their convictions, and who consider the winning of an elective office the all-important thing. They boldly (?) proclaim to their voting constituents that if the manufacturer is given a protective tariff, that then the producers of the raw material should also receive the same treatment. In other words, they denounce the tariff as robbery, but claim a part of the booty. If they believe a protective tariff dishonest in principle, they can not honestly support it, and they should have the political courage to take their stand in opposition to it. If their judgment approves the policy, they ought to say so and not deceive the public. The pending Republican tariff bill takes care of the farmer and the stockman as well as the manufacturer. It is nonsectional and fair to all classes. The question is not whether a Congressman would be willing to vote a protective tariff on raw material only if a protective tariff is placed on the manufactured products. That still leaves the main question unanswered and implies opposition to the imposition of protective duties on manufactures and raw material, and opposition to the entire protective-tariff policy.

The real question to be answered is, Do you favor a protective-tariff policy as a national policy, and if a protective tariff is placed on the raw material of our section would you be willing to place a protective tariff on manufactures on a similar basis? If the question is answered affirmatively he proclaims himself in accord with the Republican policy. If in the negative he proclaims himself only an "artful dodger" but a free trader still. Although I disagree altogether with the Democratic free-trade or tariff-for-revenue-only theory, I respect its champions who defend it honestly and courageously, and I have little respect for those candidates for office who proclaim themselves Democrats for the purpose of gaining general Democratic support and who also appeal to the protective-tariff sentiment of particular communities and particular interests. This is a popular game in Democratic Texas, where the protective-tariff sentiment is growing steadily. The Democratic national platforms for years past, including the last one adopted in 1920, has denounced in unmeasured terms the protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party. Therefore a man can not call himself a Democrat and favor any kind of protective tariff. Were I a Democrat who believed in my party and its policies I would expect the nominee of my party to make the party's fight, not repudiate his party's policies and principles, but defend them, and if he failed I would consider myself as much absolved from his support as he absolves himself from supporting his own party.

My genial friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], illustrates one other class of Texas tariff Democrats. In a speech delivered by him on July 13, 1921, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, on pages 3730 to 3734, he says:

* * * When the gentleman votes for this bill for the farmer's sake what does the farmer friend of my friend from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] find out? At 4.30 o'clock in the morning he is aroused by an alarm clock upon which a tax is paid. He rolls back cotton sheets, because that is the only kind the farmer can afford under the Republican administration, and all of the things I shall mention are protected in this bill; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] is for it. He is anxious about it. He is enthusiastic about it.

When the farmer gets out of bed he puts on his woolen or cotton underclothes, his socks, his shirt, his collar, and his woolen clothes. Though the cotton and wool in them were produced by his toil or care, he must pay a tax for the privilege of wearing them. He cuts kindling with a pocketknife and builds a fire in the fireplace whose bricks and tile and cement are taxed. He strikes a match and makes a fire in the kitchen and his wife cooks breakfast, and every metal kitchen utensil that she uses while cooking breakfast is taxed, as are the household and kitchen furniture. The breakfast table, the chairs, the knives, forks, dishes, plates, spoons, tablecloth, and napkins must pay their tribute to the tariff. He shaves himself with a razor and goes out and hitches up old Beck and uses trace chains that are taxed, as are the mule's shoes and the buckles on the harness.

Saws, blacksmith tools, grindstones, nails, staples, screws, bolts, files, and hundreds of other articles that he must buy are taxed. Why? My colleague [Mr. WURZBACH] says that it is to help the farmer. I say it is to help the manufacturer. These are things the manufacturer ships to the markets of the world and there competes with the foreigner. But he says that he can not compete here, and my colleague seems to believe him. I have not time to name even half of the articles upon which he must pay toll to the tariff favorite.

If he goes down to the back of the field to shoot squirrels or kill the crows in his corn, he has to pay a tax on the rifle and shotgun. At night, after a hard day's toil, his family gathers around the fireplace. The good wife and mother is making clothes or knitting for the children. Her scissors, needles, buttons, yarn, and clothes can not escape the taxgatherer. The joy of the children must also bear a burden. The dolls and toys with which they play on the floor must contribute to the bulging purse of the manufacturer. Why? Because some Republican is afraid that a few German toys may be shipped to the United States.

Overcome with weariness, he goes to bed and pulls the blankets around shoulders bent by a tariff load levied to "help" him.

And when on Sunday he goes to church in his automobile he has got to pay a tax on his automobile, although American cars are shipped all over the globe and cost less to make than others. And while on his way to church he pays a tax on his oil and gasoline, and if his car goes dead, even the nippers and pliers and the baling wire with which he fixes the car are taxed. And yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] believes in these things and votes for them to help the farmer. May some power save the farmer from such friends. * * *

Who has not heard this same threadbare argument a hundred times before? The impression is intended to be conveyed by the gentleman that the articles mentioned and which are used by the farmer are on the protected list in the Republican bill, but that the Democratic Party is the great friend of the farmer and that it is against the policy of his party to tax any of the above-named tools, implements, clothing, and so forth, used by the farmer.

Now, the fact is that of the fifty or more articles named above—alarm clocks, squirrel guns, German dolls, socks, razors, knives, grindstones, and all the rest—yes, all of them with the exception of only four are on the protected list of the Democratic Underwood tariff law, the law under which we are now trying to operate and which will continue to be the law until the present Republican tariff bill is passed during the present session. So that the great solicitude of the Democratic Party for the farmer is not as real as it would appear from the gentleman's remarks. The four articles mentioned as being on the free list are: Mule's shoes, nails, staples, and cement. These four, no more. What a wonderful free list for the farmer! How generous to the farmer! All the other articles—fifty or more manufactured articles, if your please—are protected by ad valorem rates of from 10 per cent to 55 per cent. And this, mark you, in a Democratic tariff law; and if the farmer has been forced to pay higher prices on account of the tariff, he must charge all such high prices on the mentioned articles for the past eight and one-half years to the Democratic Party. But the farmer is not complaining so much about the high prices he must pay for what he has to buy as he is complaining about the low prices he receives for what he has to sell. An increase of 2 cents a pound on one bale of cotton will pay for a lot of mule's shoes, nails, staples, and cement. If a protective tariff increases the prices of manufactures it also would increase the price of his own raw products that he has to sell, and the same Underwood tariff law that protects the manufacturer by placing a tariff on his products fails utterly to provide any protective tariff upon the farmer's products, but forces him to compete with the cheap labor of South America, Manchuria, Egypt, Africa, and the balance of the world.

The Republican Party consistently protects all American producers—the manufacturer, the farmer, and the stockman. The Democratic Party took care of the manufacturer and left the farmer to the care of the Lord.

I realize that I have deviated somewhat from the discussion of the fundamentals of the tariff issue, to a reference to the inconsistencies of certain alleged opponents of the protective tariff sailing under the colors of the Democratic Party. I have attempted to fairly give the position of the Democratic Party on the tariff, what is claimed to be the advantages of its free-trade and tariff-for-revenue-only policy, and I have tried to show why such a policy would not accomplish what is claimed for it by the Democrats and that the policy would bring about national commercial disaster by destroying all productive enterprise, including the farmer, the stockman, and other producers of raw material as well as the manufacturer, and inflicting the greatest injury upon a class least able to bear it—the wage-earning class of America.

I shall now briefly give the Republican position with reference to the tariff. The Republican Party has always stood for the protective-tariff idea. There has been a great deal of misrepresentation with reference to its policy. It considers that the American producer and the American laborer, who bear the burdens of American Government, pay the taxes to keep the wheels of Government in motion, who answer their country's call in time of war, to make, if necessary, the supreme sacrifice, for the Nation's life and Nation's honor, are entitled to at least a fair and equal chance with the foreign producer and foreign laborer in the American market.

Remembering the fact, as before stated, that the American standard of living and scale of wages is much higher than in foreign countries, and that consequently production costs of foreign goods are much lower than our American costs of production, and repudiating the suggestion of degrading American labor to foreign standards, and repelling also any suggestion of surrendering American production and American commercial independence to foreign production and foreign commercial domination, the question presents itself again as it has presented itself since the convening of the First American Congress. The Republican solution is the protective-tariff policy, which provides and declares that foreign producers may import their goods to be sold in the American market, but for that privilege they shall be required to pay into the American Treasury a tax, or duty, or tariff, and that tariff shall be an amount equal to the difference it costs to produce the same article in America and the cost of production in the country from which it is shipped, the cost of transportation of the foreign article being added to the foreign production costs. For instance, if the cost of raising or producing cattle in South America is $30 per head, including transportation to an American port, and it costs $50 to produce the same kind of cattle in this country, the Republican protective-tariff policy would require the South American producer to pay $20 per head for the privilege of competing with the American product. This policy not only supplies revenue to our Government but prevents the destruction of the American cattle industry, for it does not require much argument to convince any intelligent human being that if South American beef is offered for sale in the American market for less than American beef of the same quality can be sold that the American consumer will buy the cheaper beef, and it will naturally and inevitably follow that the American cattle raiser will be forced out of business or into bankruptcy and financial ruin.

When this is accomplished, and the competition of the American cattleman destroyed, no one is so foolish, I hope, as to believe that the South American cattle would not rise in price to at least the former level. The same is true of every American product competing with a foreign product. It is true of wool, hides, long-staple cotton, peanuts, pecans, vegetable oils, and other raw materials as it is also true of manufactures.

I can not understand the statesmanship of men who would surrender the American market which consumes 90 per cent of all American production for the illusory hope of winning a foreign market for the 10 per cent surplus American production. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and we ought also to remember the fable of the dog with the bone in his mouth crossing the stream. It would be political folly to give up a 90 per cent substance for a 10 per cent shadow. If we lose the substance we also lose the shadow, for how can we expect to compete with foreign producers in foreign lands, with transportation costs added to the American product, if we make it impossible for ourselves to compete with the foreigner in our own land? But if we hold our own 90 per cent market, the thing of substance, we are in at least as favorable a position to sell our surplus in foreign markets as we would be in the other case. There is little if any sentiment in domestic commerce and less in international. The foreigner will not buy from us because of any love and affection he bears for us, and he will not refuse to buy from us on account of any lack of affectionate regard, but he will be controlled solely by his own selfish interest, limited only by his ability to buy. That is just simple human nature. But free-trade advocates reply that their policy is the only one that gives the foreigner the ability to buy from us. They especially stress this argument at this time when foreign nations are heavily indebted to the United States Government and to the great international bankers of Wall Street.

The contention is made that we should so arrange American business affairs as to give greatest advantage and prosperity to foreign producers. That we should permit the free importation of foreign goods, give them the American market to exploit to their profit and advantage, and surrender the 90 per cent American market so that foreign nations and foreign producers will be enabled to sell the bulk of their cheaply produced goods to the American consumer. Under that plan, according to the Democratic notion, they will be able to pay us the vast sums they now owe us. It is undeniable that such a plan would mean prosperity to the foreign producer, and it is equally true that the holders of foreign bonds and securities would be better able to collect their debts. But at what a cost! I am opposed to canceling the foreign debt in one way or the other, either by straight gift or putting it in the power of foreign producers by means of a free-trade policy to exploit the American producer and the American wage earner and thus to pay their debts with money taken from American pockets, but if I were forced to make a choice, then I should prefer making a clear and straight-out gift and be credited at least with charitable motives. I would also prefer a quick and clean cancellation of the foreign indebtedness to the plans suggested by free-trade Democrats, because the last-mentioned plan would, through the destruction of American living standards and American wage scales, mean the complete destruction of American business.

Let me give a practical illustration of what I mean: If you were a country merchant and had a customer who was unable to pay his account you would probably extend the time for payment, and if convinced that he would never be able to pay you might and probably would cancel the debt; but certainly you would not turn over to your debtor the keys of your store and invite him to help himself from your shelves, take your goods, sell them in competition with yours, so that he might with the proceeds of the sale of your goods settle his debt to you. Such a settlement would be a very unsatisfactory settlement and could not be considered a payment at all; and worse than that, your business would have been seriously injured and perhaps destroyed in the operation.

The Democratic Party has been making a desperate attempt to convince the wage earner of America of the merits of free-trade or nonprotective tariff policy. It is not necessary to repeat that the wage earner is the principal producer and that he is the most important factor in all productive industry. If American production suffers, the American workman suffers, and he suffers at once, and long before capital, the other factor in production, feels the pinch. American labor is the best paid in the world, and the American wage earner enjoys comforts unknown to foreign wage earners, and we hope to continue that condition and improve it if possible. This happy condition is due to the fact that this country is blessed with wonderful natural resources, and we have greater wealth production than any other nation in this or any other age.

If we do not voluntarily surrender the advantages we now have in that respect by opening our markets to the cheap products of foreign pauper labor or permit unlimited immigration of foreign labor, we will always have a happy and contented people. We can not expect general happiness and contentment in America unless the working classes are kept employed in productive labor and are given the opportunity to earn wages commensurate with the wealth they produce and sufficient to furnish them with not only all the necessaries but with many of the comforts and some of the luxuries of life.

I have never been able to understand the inconsistency of Democrats who favor a restricted immigration, but oppose a protective tariff, or, in other words, who favor the exclusion of the pauper laborer from our shores, but who oppose the exclusion of the goods made by the same pauper labor. The same principle of the preservation of the rights and dignity of American labor are involved in both propositions. Certainly, it is true that the more foreign labor immigration we have the greater will be the supply of labor and correspondingly less the demand, and as unemployment increases the price of labor decreases. This is the law of supply and demand. But has it ever occurred to the American wage earner that there is to all intents and purposes a foreign laborer wrapped up in every bundle of foreign-made goods shipped to this country? This is a greater disadvantage to the American laborer than if the foreign laborer himself were admitted.

In the latter event the foreigner would become a bearer of the burdens of our Government, in the course of time a taxpayer, and gradually be forced to a standard of living, a scale of wage similar to ours and later equal to that of the American wage earner. Competition with such an immigrant would be on fairly equal terms. But not so in the case of the bundle of foreign-made goods. There the product of pauper labor competes, but the pauper laborer continues to live in a foreign country under foreign living conditions, low wage scale, and it is utterly impossible for American labor to compete under such circumstances. Strange, indeed, that a comparison so simple as this does not convince all wage earners of America that they must either abandon their ancient but well-grounded opposition to pauper-labor immigration or join with the Republican Party in restricting the importation of foreign-made goods by levying on such goods a duty equal to the difference in foreign and domestic cost of production. Foreign labor conditions may in the distant future level up to American conditions, but a sound American statesmanship will never consent to level our high standards down to theirs. Whenever American production costs can be reduced to foreign production costs, then only would the free-trade policy of the Democratic Party be practicable. As that could only be accomplished by equalizing our wage scale to the foreign scale—that is, by putting American labor on a pauper scale—I am not willing to adopt that remedy. I prefer the policy of the Republican Party, under whose administrations we have enjoyed greatest prosperity.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the nationalization of education, and to include therein a letter from Representative ANDREW of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject indicated, including the insertion of a letter from his colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] on the subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SMITH-TOWNER BILL.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the Sterling-Towner bill is on the calendars of both Houses and undoubtedly will sooner or later be considered, possibly by the Sixty-seventh Congress. The Smith-Towner bill is what is known as the education bill. Briefly the provisions of the bill are as follows: First, it creates a department of education, of equal authority and position with the other departments of the Government, such as the Department of the Treasury, of the Interior, of the Army, Navy, and so forth. It will have, of course, a secretary of education, who will be entitled to a seat in the Cabinet upon the same plane with the other Secretaries of departments. The salary of this secretary of education will be $12,000 a year, with an assistant secretary of education at a salary to be fixed later by Congress, together with the full complement of employees which of necessity is included in a great department of the Government.

Second, the department will start with an appropriation of $100,000,000, which, following the inevitable expansion attached to all Government functions, will grow into millions more. This fund is to be used as follows: For the instruction of illiterates 14 years of age and over; for the instruction of immigrants 14 years of age and over in the English language and in civics; for the partial payment of teachers' salaries; and for physical education and instruction in the principles of health and sanitation; for the improvement of teachers in service and for the more adequate preparation of prospective teachers.

It is claimed by the proponents of this bill that the rights of communities and of the States will not be interfered with.

Great stress is laid upon this assertion, and to emphasize it those who favor this measure point to the repeated declarations in the bill that the States will not be interfered with by the Department of Education if created. Of course such arguments are silly and scarcely deserve consideration; certainly not by intelligent people. When in the history of human affairs was any function of government content to rest within the bounds of its original limitations? What department or bureau of this Government can be cited as an instance of this contentment? On the contrary, everyone knows, who knows anything about such matters, that every department and every bureau and every commission, in fact, created by Congress has gone far beyond the original purpose of Congress and year by year has assumed more and more authority and control, not only executing the original purposes whereby and wherefore they were created but has reached out even brazenly and created new purposes, if in any way they were correlated therewith. Those who undertake to justify the creation of a department of education on the ground that the secretary of education will be content to occupy his seat in the Cabinet and merely gather statistics and divide up the $100,000,000 among States without going any further are themselves guilty either of lack of natural intelligence or sincerity and truth. This matter might just as well be looked squarely in the face now as later. No man of a commanding intelligence sufficient to warrant his selection as secretary of education will be restrained from having his own ideas as to education and from attempting to put those ideas into effect, no matter if every word in the law was a prohibition against such effort on his part. It must not be forgotten that this secretary of education will have a great department, with hundreds of positions to be filled at the very beginning, from positions of high salary down to remunerative positions for stenographers, clerks, typewriters, and so forth. With this patronage at his disposal, backed by the potential power of a hundred million appropriation, he would find little opposition on the part of a State superintendent of education if he desired to put into effect certain ideas of his own. The matter need not be argued further, because human nature is the same old quality, subject, as all human nature is in all other activities in life, to the influences of ambition and selfish seeking.

When a State superintendent of education was quietly informed by an august secretary of education, clothed with all the prestige and dignity of a Cabinet officer, that a certain history of the United States contained the real truth as to certain historical matters, or that a certain work on political economy or on sociology were the proper textbooks for public-school instruction, how many of such superintendents would shake their heads and disagree, knowing that thereby they would lose the favor of the head of this great function of Government and probably cut themselves off not only from all future national advancement but probably endanger their State positions as well. I have elaborated this one feature of the bill because it is the real purpose of those who are behind it—the nationalization of education—a purpose as full of resolve and determination as Bismarck had after 1870 for the purpose of German conquest. That this is true some of the proponents of the bill unhesitatingly declare that their desire is to have all education in the country placed under the supreme direction and control of this proposed Cabinet officer. As for the rest, whether they admit it or not, if they are fit to be called educators by reason of the possession of a fair intelligence, they know this to be the ultimate purpose. Therefore let us look at this matter fairly, and, stripping off the husks, consider the real issue, which is, Shall education of the children of America be put under the sole control of a Cabinet officer at Washington, or shall education remain under the control of the fathers and the mothers of the various communities of this land? It should not be forgotten, moreover, that if we resolve to place education under the control of the Federal Government we will necessarily resolve to place all taxation for school purposes under the control of Congress, thus robbing the taxpayer of the land of any control over his pocketbook and of any control over the money after it leaves his pocketbook. This is the most momentous question presented for the consideration of the American people since the close of the Civil War. It involves the gravest certainties; it means tyranny and taxation; it means that a majority in Congress can tax the people of Delaware without their consent; it means the practical certainty of transforming national character; it means to mold the minds of the youth of the United States according to the desire of one man, who will possess the power to select and prescribe the truths involved in education; it means to destroy that best feature of our national life, the diversification of thought created by varying conditions of soil and climate, which would be as deadly as the design of some lunatic who would level the mountains and the hills, fill up the valleys and streams, and convert the topography of the country into one monotonous dead level. There are many other arguments against this measure which I will here briefly summarize:

First. The plan is unnecessary, because illiteracy is declining in the United States and not increasing.

Second. The plan is unnecessary also because the people of the various States and communities expend now sufficiently enormous funds for education for all rational purposes.

Third, the plan would destroy local control of education; and the local keen interest in all school matters.

Fourth. The plan would rob the people of their control over the amount of taxation, as well as deprive them of the power to expend it.

Fifth. The appropriation is inadequate. Even a hundred millions of dollars would not be a drop in the bucket for the carrying out of such a scheme if enacted into law, when billions are now spent for this purpose by the various communities and States of the Federal Union.

Sixth. Such legislation would be untimely, even if expedient, under the present conditions of the country with the intolerable burden of taxation already existing.

Seventh. The plan would produce uniformity in education. This would be the destruction of a highly desirable and splendid diversification of American thought and character.

Eighth. The plan would inevitably lead to political involvement. The secretary of education would necessarily be a political appointee, subject to the same political influences in appointment that all other Cabinet appointments are subject to.

Ninth. The plan would invite and invoke a religious controversy, which would be regrettably undesirable from a national standpoint.

Tenth. The plan is undemocratic and un-American, and plainly borrowed from European and especially German sources.

Eleventh. Education in a democracy is essentially a home and a community matter—where the children of the home belong to the parents, and not to the State—as the Socialists and the Bolsheviki teach.

Twelfth. The plan is plainly unconstitutional, and in direct conflict with the reserved rights of the people under our national organic law. If put into effect, it would destroy the liberty of the people, their sense of initiative and personal responsibility, and transform them into dependents upon a paternal government—thus killing the spirit and the purpose of the founders of our great democracy.

Thirteenth. The plan of Federal "contributions" to the States is uneconomical for the State of Delaware. Delaware would not receive an allotment in proportion to the amount of internal revenue collected in the State.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the foregoing, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a letter written by Mr. A. PIATT ANDREW, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, expressing his views upon this same subject.

TOWNER-STERLING BILL DESTRUCTIVE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The following letter was addressed on May 24, 1922, by Congressman A. PIATT ANDREW, to Mrs. F. P. Bagley, a member of the national committee for a department of education, in reply to an inquiry from that committee as to whether he would aid in securing the passage of the Towner-Sterling bill.

MY DEAR MRS. BAGLEY: I have you letter asking my "frank opinion" of the Towner-Sterling bill, and inclosing a circular containing arguments in defense of that measure. I have read this circular, as I have many other documents for and against the bill, and am bound to say that I am more than ever convinced of the validity of the position which I took in our discussion at Salem Willows last summer.

Subsequent reading and correspondence has confirmed my belief that the most distinguished educators of the country are almost unanimously opposed to the Towner-Sterling bill, even in its revised form. I refer to such recognized leaders as President Emeritus Eliot, President Lowell, and Dean Briggs, of Harvard, as well as Dr. Alexander Inglis, director of the Harvard Graduate School of Education; President Hibben and Dean West, of Princeton; President Butler, of Columbia; President Goodnow, of Johns Hopkins; former President Hadley, of Yale; President Sills, of Bowdoin; as well as such distinguished heads of State universities as President Kinley, of the University of Illinois; President Jessup, of the University of Iowa; Dean Sutton, of the University of Texas—all of whom, with many others whom I might name, seriously disapprove of the bill. I should be inclined to consult with an oculist before having an operation performed on my eyes, and I should certainly consult with an experienced farmer, if I had it in mind to invest money in farming. Similarly, before espousing a plan to invest a vast amount of Government money in an experiment in education, it would seem wise to weigh carefully the opinions of educational experts, and the fact that such experts in this case are substantially agreed in opposing the Towner-Sterling bill would seem of itself a powerful argument against it.

You state in your circular that the Towner-Sterling bill has two essentials: First, a department of education with a secretary in the President's Cabinet * * *; second, * * * it provides Federal aid in education.

As a general proposition, the multiplication of Cabinet officers is open to question. An essential if not the main purpose of the Cabinet is to serve as an advisory council to the President in framing the broad lines of policy of his administration. In order to function helpfully and efficiently in this capacity, the Cabinet should be small in number and composed only of men of the first rank in ability and experience. The creation of new departments in the past has not only made the Cabinet somewhat unwieldy in proportions, but it has distinctly lowered the caliber of Cabinet membership. Since men of the first rank can seldom be found for other than departments of the first rank, on this account, if on no other, I should hesitate to indorse any proposal to increase the number of minor Cabinet officials.

A secretary of education would be appointed for only four years. He would have to be of the political party of the President then in power. If we are to believe the advocates of the Towner-Sterling bill, and if we are to accept the revised text of section 13 as literally meaning what it states, the secretary of education would "exercise no authority" over "education within the States," which means that he would have neither power of supervision over, nor authority to raise and enforce, standards of education anywhere in the United States. Certainly such a position would not appeal to any of the great educational leaders of the country. The creation of the position would mean one more Cabinet officer of secondary capacity, who probably would be appointed as the result of political or geographical pressure.

Moreover, if this were the case, if the man appointed was "in politics" and was a politician of the second or third rank, would not the inevitable result, as our Government actually works, be to PUT EDUCATION INTO POLITICS?

Would it not open another field added to the post offices, internal revenue, and prohibition enforcement services in which Congressmen and Senators alike would seek to find opportunities to reward those who had helped them in their campaigns? Would it not also be natural to expect that books, pamphlets, posters, and circular letters containing information and suggestions with a party bias would be regularly distributed by the department to every public school and State institution of learning in the country. It is because of such deplorable possibilities, bordering in my opinion upon probabilities, that I am seriously distrustful of any and every plan to establish a department of education with a secretary in the Cabinet.

You name as a second essential feature of the Towner-Sterling bill Federal aid in education. Every good American believes it as much a Government's duty to provide schools and to encourage education as it is to provide a police force and to discourage crime, but it is quite another question as to the agency of government which is to perform these duties. Our American tradition is based upon a fairly clear delimitation of the respective functions of the Federal, State, and municipal governments. The Federal Government is charged with matters that are essentially national, and which can not be well looked after by the States, such as the Army and Navy, the monetary system, post offices, the regulation of foreign and domestic trade. The State governments look after activities that are not of an interstate character on the one hand and that can not be properly handled by counties or towns or municipalities on the other. The smaller governmental units look after local matters. The school system seems to me essentially a matter to be handled by the localities, with such cooperation from the States as will provide higher and technical education not possible to small communities. It is in this way that our public-school system has developed. It is through such agencies that it can develop still further in the future, with a flexible and free adaptation to local needs.

Our system of government is very fortunately differentiated from that of European countries with monarchical and military traditions, in that it is not highly centralized but is a Federal or federated Government based essentially upon the principle of home rule. In that fact lies the source and the assurance of the freedom that we cherish, of which we are justly proud and which we are bound to safeguard and transmit to the future. I can see, therefore, no force in the argument that our Federal Government ought to assume such functions as the supervision of education because the central Governments of other nations have done so. Our form of government, our traditions, our political theories are essentially different from theirs.

We are in fact the more bound to pay attention to these differences to-day because under stress of war our National Government has assumed many powers and activities that rightfully belong to the States, and even to private organizations. If the spirit of American institutions and the American principle of home rule in government are to survive, our primary duty to-day is to see that the National Government not only trespasses no further upon the provinces of the States and the rights of individuals but that it actually returns to the States and to private initiative many of those activities which it was forced in war time to assume.

If I have in this very brief statement made myself clear, you will understand why I believe that the whole principle underlying the Towner-Sterling and other similar bills for Federal intervention and aid in State matters is wrong. It seems to me to be based on the war-time theory that the National Government should do those things which it was not originally intended to do. It is based on the confused notion that our American Government should abandon the heritage which has come down to us from the earliest days of our history, and that we should adopt the highly centralized methods of the Old World countries with their military and monarchical traditions.

There are many other reasons, general and particular, why I am opposed to the Towner-Sterling bill; for example, the extravagance involved in the duplication of agencies which it provides, the inequitable burden of taxation which it imposes upon efficient States for the benefit of those which are remiss. But this will perhaps sufficiently answer your question as to whether or not I can be counted upon to aid in the passage of the bill. I trust that it will also convey to you the sincerity of my conviction that the bill is essentially and fundamentally wrong.

Very truly yours,

A. PIATT ANDREW.

P. S.—I notice on page 2 of your circular that you quote President Harding as apparently favoring the bill because he stated that "from every corner of the land, from county, town, and city, comes the same report, that the housing capacity of our public schools is inadequate, that tens of thousands of pupils have no place for their studies." But surely this passage in no way can be construed to argue the adoption of a bill which in section 12 provides, "that no money apportioned to a State in any of the provisions of this act shall be used by any State or local authority, directly or indirectly, for the purchase, rental, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of land."

I note also that on page 3 of your circular you state that an argument against the present entry of the Federal Government into education "overlooks the fact that the Federal Government has contributed to education in the States for over 200 years." If my education in history and arithmetic is not in error, this would seem to imply that the Federal Government began to contribute to education in the States more than half a century before the Federal Government existed.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by Representative GRIFFIN on Flag Day in New York City.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a speech delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] on Flag Day in New York City. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

FLAG DAY ADDRESS OF HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, OF NEW YORK, AT FLAG DAY CELEBRATION UNDER THE AUSPICES OF ROYAL ARCANUM, IN BRONX BOROUGH, CITY OF NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1922.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am always glad to address a fraternal body. This is no mere formal compliment or ingratiating salutation. The reasons for my partiality are deeply rooted in a long experience with men. When I was a very young man I had formulated for my guidance the thought that every man should stand on his own resources and fight his way in the world with his own talents and on his own merits. I still most firmly adhere to that maxim. The only limitations on it, in practice, is that it may often lead us into the danger of arrogant isolation. With the greatest talent in the world no man can ultimately succeed without a sympathy for humanity and the practice of good fellowship.

In my own experience I soon found that men were not all alike—that there were crooked as well as straight; that some were virtuous and others base; that some were sychophants, who worshipped power and pelf; and others, cads, who worshipped the fetish of birth and breeding. Others were bigots who measured their fellow men according to their professed creeds, and to whom the church one went to figured higher than personal virtues or qualifications.

It was, therefore, a great satisfaction to me, very early in my career, to find myself, through some whim of fate, enrolled in this splendid order, where virtue, charity, and humanity were the sole tests of a man's worth. For in this fraternity all men have a fair start and the virtues and talents of men are appraised according to their true value.

I am always glad to see a man wear a button of a fraternity. It is a recommendation, as well as a public profession, of the company he keeps. There is not an order which makes this public profession of its convictions by the custom of wearing a pin, a symbol, or a button that does not prescribe the most rigid tests to make sure of the high character of its membership. The process of membership building may be likened to a separation of the sheep from the goats. No man can enter this order who does not withstand the test as to his personal history and integrity. No man enters this order unless he loves his family and has a deep concern for their future happiness. Unselfishness, therefore, may be said to be the corner stone of the fraternity.

As the button or other device of an order may be said to be the symbol of its profession, so our country's flag, which we unite to honor on this occasion, is the symbol of our Nation's purest and highest ideals. This flag of ours, the glorious Stars and Stripes, is not the flag of any race or creed. No one has the right to monopolize its glory or its protection. It is the symbol of America and of all for which America stands. Its message to the world is liberty, equality, and fraternity. It is the symbol of the true, and not the false, American. The true American is not the man whose ancestors came over on the Mayflower. His ancestors may have come over years ago on a sailing ship, or, more recently, in the steerage of a modern steamship. When they came, whenever that was, they had in them the making of good Americans, because they hated tyranny and loved liberty.

True Americanism does not depend on lineage or place of birth. It consists of devotion to an idea—an ideal, if you please, and a love of our country and our flag. It does not consist of a selfish or narrow provincialism. It does not consist of hate or of intolerance. The man born abroad may be a better American than he who, boasting of his lineage, repudiates by his life and conduct all of the noble ideals of equity, justice, toleration, and humanity upon which our glorious Republic was founded.

When we were drawn into the recent World War and spellbinders on every street and in every meeting place were eloquently appealing to our boys to enlist to save democracy, they did not call only for those who could trace their ancestry back to colonial times. The only credentials demanded to wear the khaki or the Navy blue were love of country and loyalty to our flag. General O'Ryan, the commander of the Twenty-seventh Division, which made a glorious record in the World War, said shortly after his return from the field of battle that he was amazed at the number of men in his division who bore German names. None will deny that the brave young men who gave up their lives on the fields of Flanders were good Americans. Yet there are narrow-minded folks to-day who would deny to the brothers and sisters of those boys, and foreclose to them, because of their birth and lineage, the civic and political advantages of our Republic. When our lines of khaki at the zero hour stepped promptly out of the trenches and tore across no man's land to meet certain death or mutilation amidst the rain of shot and shell no one would dare venture to make invidious distinctions as to race, creed, or previous condition of servitude—they were all then incontestably good Americans.

What did they fight for? No one in intimate touch with the soldiers as they embarked upon their perilous journey to carry the American flag to its place in the battle line can deny that they fought for an ideal. They may have appeared indifferent to their mission; they may have indulged in drollery; but whether they sang "Hail! Hail! The gang's all here!" or "We won't come back till its over, over there" those who had the opportunity to sound their deeper sentiments are firm in the conviction that they knew that they were fighting for the noblest and highest ideals of our country.

We Americans are self-deprecatory. We do not like sham and humbug. Instead of wearing our emotions on our sleeves we are even a little bit prone to conceal our loftiest sentiments. While other peoples prate of their sentiments we are prone to deprecate ours. Thus we have by our own delicacy given encouragement to the fallacy, current in other countries, that the American people are a drab, commercial race with no ideals above the almighty dollar; and yet, my friends, if you will whip your memories you will find that our entire history discredits that malicious slander.

Take the American Revolution. That struggle was not fought for dollars. Our forefathers could have saved much money by paying the trifling tax on tea and secured amity and peace. But they were resolved that there would be "no taxation without representation," and upon that principle they threw down the gauntlet to the most powerful nation in the then known world.

Take the war with the Barbary States. We could have secured our peace by paying the slight tribute, which even the greatest nations in Europe had submitted to. But the young Nation refused to stultify its conviction that the sea should be free to all. President Jefferson sent a naval and military force into the Mediterranean, whipped the Barbary pirates into submission, and put an end to the vicious tribute system.

Again, in the war of 1812 we fought for the freedom of the seas; an ideal, if you please, and showed that we were no more indulgent to a great power like Great Britain in an invasion of our rights than we were to the Barbary pirates.

In the Mexican War we fought for the freedom of Texas. In the great Civil War we fought to strike the shackles from the ankles of the slave and to uphold the integrity and permanency of the Federal Union.

In 1898 we fought to give liberty to the Cubans, and having conquered we did not as most allies in such circumstances have done, as recorded in history; we did not assume a sovereignty over the weaker nation we helped to freedom, but after establishing them in their new found independence we hauled down our flag and left them to work out their own salvation.

No, my friends, our entire history as a Nation has been devotion to the highest and noblest ideals for the welfare of humanity. It is for this reason that I insist that our flag is a symbol of something greater than mere sovereignty. It is the symbol of justice and humanity to all the world. We should ever keep this in mind: that lip service to the flag is not enough to constitute an American, nor blind unthinking idolatry of a mere piece of cloth or silk. It is a beautiful flag, but it is not the material or the colors or the symbols which make the flag, but the great and noble concepts of liberty, humanity, and justice which it symbolizes.

We have, unfortunately, in this country to-day many who have not fully grasped the import of our flag or properly appraised the lessons of our history. They think that the flag should only protect those of a certain race or creed. Their spirit is one of medieval intolerance and injustice. They would make of this country what China and Japan were a century ago. They would close our ports to "foreign devils." They would deny the privileges of American citizenship to all except those of a certain race and religion. They would take down from its pedestal in our beautiful harbor of New York the statue of liberty which extends its welcome to the oppressed of all the world. They would exclude Jews and Catholics and negroes from holding public office. They would make of our country a Nation hated and abhorred. It seems incredible that in this day and hour in the world's history such bigotry and intolerance should find a foothold in the country of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

And who are they who would stultify and debase the traditions of our Nation? They are more numerous than you think. They have formed themselves into an order—a "fraternal" order if you please—in which all Christianity, all humanity, all toleration and charity have been utterly abandoned. To conceal their bigotry, their hate, and their inhumanity they have revived the Civil War Ku-Klux Klan, and, with the highest professions of patriotism, religion, and morality, they have debased our glorious emblem to advance their own selfishness. It is not an open fraternity like yours, with public manifestations of membership, of which every honest man should not be ashamed, but a secret, oath-bound organization whose membership is known only to those who have been initiated into its sham mysteries. They ride masked by night. They indulge in safe and cheap terrorism. They pretend to be organized to enforce law and order, but their only manifestation so far has been to break down law and order. They have organized a shadowy, hidden empire within our Nation and undertake to seize from the recognized and lawful officers of the land the right to try and punish alleged offenders in their own secret tribunals.

What is this but treason? Is it not a secession from our Government? Is it not establishing a new government within our Government in contravention of the Constitution of our fathers? Of what virtue is our Constitution or its Bill of Rights if it is conceded that any group of men may have the liberty to organize an invisible government and usurp the functions of civil government as organized under that Constitution. The question answers itself. No sane man, not blinded by hate and intolerance, will dare avow that such an oath-bound secret organization has the right to exist under our Constitution. And yet, my friends, it seems to be growing. Only last week they had an election in Oregon, and this un-American order came boldly into a political contest for governor, and the most lamentable feature of its intervention is that it came within a few hundred votes of electing its candidate upon its platform of race and religious bigotry.

Let us hope, my friends, that this revival of know-nothingism may meet the fate of its predecessors. It is the greatest menace that has so far appeared in American history to disturb the stability and integrity of American institutions. But, please God, the wisdom that guided our ancestors, and brought them safely through great trials and perils, will come again to our land and make that beautiful flag of freedom, which waves over us to-night, the emblem of a noble, true-hearted, and patriotic people, united in peace and amity, without regard to race, creed, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in 8-point type a statement given out by Congressman HARDY of Texas, Congressman DAVIS of Tennessee, and Congressman BANHEAKD of Alabama on the ship subsidy bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a statement by the Congressmen mentioned on the shipping bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I put it "ship subsidy bill."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are those the minority views?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No. This is a statement. The minority views the gentleman has already read, I am sure.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I was asking if it was the same statement as the minority views.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I imagine it would be nothing different from the minority views.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, both those gentlemen have spoken, and their remarks are inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a statement given out by Congressman HARDY of Texas, Congressman DAVIS of Tennessee, and Congressman BANKHEAD of Alabama on the ship subsidy bill.

Congressmen HARDY of Texas, DAVIS of Tennessee, and BANKHEAD, members of the Merchant Marine Committee of the House, have issued the following statement:

"Being opposed to the ship subsidy bill, we gladly welcome the injunction of the President that the question be carried to the people. However, we are fully aware of the very great difficulty, if not impossibility, of getting the real facts before the general public, inasmuch as those who are attempting to protect the interests of the whole people are without any pecuniary interest and without resources and facilities for disseminating the facts. We fully realize the very great odds against the opponents of this bill in attempting to combat the widespread propaganda, persistent efforts, and vast resources of the Shipping Board and the Shipping Trust, aided by the influence of the Chief Executive.

"With the hope that same may reach at least some of the people, we wish to state some unvarnished, uncontrovertible facts.

"In the remarkable letter to Leader MONDELL, signed by President Harding, it is stated:

"'There was an expression of the popular mind in 1920. The party now charged with responsibility spoke in no uncertain terms about 'the promotion and maintenance of an American merchant marine.' The question was not made paramount, but the pledge was covenanted.

"The portion of the Republican national platform of 1920, from which the above quotation was taken, is as follows:

"'We indorse the sound legislation recently enacted by the Republican Congress that will insure the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine.

"It will be noted that the Republican platform thus boasted of and stood upon the Jones Act, which had just become a law, as a solution of the problem, as legislation 'that will insure the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine.' There was no pledge or intimation of ship subsidies or any additional legislation, except that the platform further declared, 'We favor the application of the workmen's compensation act to the merchant marine.' The only pledge in the platform for additional legislation on the subject has not been carried out.

"We challenge anybody to point to a single utterance by President Harding or any other responsible speaker during the last campaign who raised the question of ship subsidies, or even intimated that such was necessary or that a ship subsidy bill would be considered by the Congress. The only specific pledge made by the President with regard to the merchant marine problem, so far as we recall, was that he was reported to have criticized President Wilson for not having complied with the direction contained in section 34 of the Jones Act, and to have stated in substance that one of his first official acts would be to carry into execution the said section. When he became President and investigated the question he reached the same conclusion previously reached by President Wilson—that it was impracticable and unwise, if not impossible, to carry into effect the provisions of said section 34.

"In addition to the fact that the proponents of the Jones bill claimed at the time of its passage that it was a complete and adequate solution of the problem, as reiterated in the Republican national platform, Chairman Lasker at the hearings declared that, in his belief, 'if the Jones law could have been carried out as as a whole it would have given us an American merchant marine without asking for further legislation.'

"Section 273 of the pending bill, allowing a deduction from net Federal income taxes of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels, was provided as a substitute for said section 34 of the Jones Act. Both Chairman Lasker and Winthrop L. Marvin, general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, stated at the hearings that this substitute provision is 'far more valuable and effective' than section 34 of the Jones Act; and they are undoubtedly correct, for the very cogent reasons stated by them.

"Yet the pending bill not only provides a substitute 'far more valuable and effective' than section 34 of the Jones Act but also amends said act in several vital respects, and in addition provides enormous direct subsidies as well as numerous other direct and indirect aids to the shipping interests, which will cost the American people at least $75,000,000 per year and which will amount to at least 50 per cent more than the aggregate amount paid by all foreign nations in the form of subsidies, bounties, subventions, ocean-mail pay, and of every other form of direct or indirect aid to the construction and navigation of their merchant marines.

"As a matter of fact, action on the ship subsidy bill was not postponed for the purpose of giving the people an opportunity to become acquainted with the provisions of the bill and to express their views thereon. Every effort has been made to ram the bill through so as to avoid this.

"Aside from such efforts by Chairman Lasker and the shipping interests, when the proponents of the bill had completed the presentation of their witnesses, the President summoned the majority members of the committees holding the hearings to the White House and told them to rush the hearings to a conclusion; that this bill was his pet measure and he wanted it reported out and passed as soon as possible; he made similar appeals to the leaders of the House; he addressed a letter to the chairman of the Rules Committee, in which he expressed his deep interest in the speedy passage of the bill and threatened to call Congress into extraordinary session for the purpose of acting on it if Congress should adjourn without taking such action. According to all reports, he at first impatiently spurned the advice of the leaders of his party in the House that action on the bill be delayed until Members and the country could have time to study the bill and the voluminous hearings, and insisted on immediate action. As to what caused the President to undergo such a change in attitude as to agree to the postponement of action on the bill, we submit an explanation which appeared in the New York Tribune, a stanch supporter of the President and the ship subsidy bill, as follows:

"Reports made to the President * * * indicated that the whole ship subsidy bill was in danger of defeat. Some Members of the House implored the President not to force a vote at this time, fearing that a roll call would result in the killing of the measure, carrying with it a repudiation of the President. Incidentally, they feared the political consequences at the election in November of a split between the House and the President over what he had made such a strong administration (measure).

"In referring to the same matter an editorial in the New York Times stated:

"In acceding to the wishes of the House, President Harding may say that he merely bowed to the inevitable. He speaks now about desiring to ascertain the popular 'reaction' to the ship subsidy bill. It had, however, already been manifested.

"The 'reaction' of the people on ship subsidies has been manifested every time its greedy head has dared raise itself; it was manifested in such a way that the Hanna ship subsidy bill died a borning, although the expense of that bill involved about one twenty-fifth of that involved in the pending bill; and the 'reaction' of the people was again manifested when the Frye bill, calling for about the same expense, passed the Senate but was never brought up in the House because of the tremendous opposition that developed. The 'reaction' of the people was again manifested when the Gallinger bill, involving about one-fifteenth of the cost of the present bill, was defeated. The 'reaction' of the people has been repeatedly manifested in that no political party has ever dared declare in its platform in favor of ship subsidies, even when such was a live issue in Congress. The 'reaction' of the people with respect to the pending bill was manifested by the overwhelming nomination of Smith W. Brookhart for Senator on a platform opposing the ship subsidy bill; it has been manifested by uniform denunciation of it by farm and labor conventions and recently in practically all of the farm and labor journals throughout the country, as well as in numerous other ways. The 'reaction' of the people was made manifest to their Representatives in Congress to such an extent that the champions of the bill reached the conclusion that a majority of the Members would vote against the bill if pressed to a vote at this time in spite of the extraordinary pressure brought to bear upon them from sources other than their constituencies.

"The purpose of this postponement is not to ascertain the present attitude of the people but is to change their attitude—as suggested by the President, to produce a 'favorable reaction' on the part of the people so as to change a sufficient number of Members of the House to permit the passage of the bill. 'Reaction' means a reversal of action, and that is what they want. In his letter to the majority leader the President calls upon the Members to take the matter direct to their constituencies for the purpose of obtaining 'such reaction.' If the Members will discuss this bill freely with the folks back home they will doubtless hear many wholesome truths. We hope that they will explain to their constituencies the following facts:

"1. That the passage of this bill will not 'save hundreds of millions of dollars in liquidation of our shipping assets,' as suggested by the President, but that Chairman Lasker himself does not hope to obtain more than $200,000,000 for the entire fleet; and that if this bill passes, the charge upon the public Treasury for the next 10 years would be at least $750,000,000, not to speak of the fact that the fleet would be sold for several hundred million dollars less than what would have been its pre-war cost—wholly disregarding the actual cost of the fleet.

"2. That this bill provides for a loan to shipowners of a revolving fund of $125,000,000, such to be loaned at 2 per cent interest and for 15 years at a time, and up to two-thirds the cost of the ships upon which the loans are to be made, although the average life of a ship is estimated at 20 years; whereas, even under the Federal farm-loan system farmers are compelled to pay about 6 per cent interest, and are not allowed to borrow more than 50 per cent of the market value of their farms, which constitute permanent security.

"3. That this bill exempts shipowners from the payment of all Federal taxes provided the amount which would otherwise be payable as taxes is invested or set aside for investment in new ship construction.

"4. That it is not even claimed by the proponents of this bill that the people will obtain any cheaper ocean freight rates, and that the bill does not pretend to provide for any sort of regulation of such rates; on the other hand, Chairman Lasker at the hearings called attention to the fact that by reason of the provision authorizing a deduction from net income taxes of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American vessels, an importer or exporter could afford to pay 4 per cent more for the carriage of his goods on American vessels than they would be carried for on foreign vessels and still save 1 per cent.

"5. That this bill authorizes the Shipping Board to make contracts for the payment of subsidies for a period of 10 years from the date of making contract, this being admittedly for the purpose of preventing a repeal of the act by subsequent Congresses.

"6. That, instead of the Shipping Board coming to Congress each year for necessary appropriations to carry out the provisions of the bill, as all other departments of the Government are required to do, this bill is so framed as to avoid this, it directing the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to the merchant marine fund certain receipts, and 'all moneys in the fund are hereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of making such payments' of voyage subsidies 'upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the board.'

"7. That this bill confers upon the Shipping Board the most autocratic and unprecedented powers with respect to selling ships, making loans, making subsidy contracts, and handling enormous sums of money ever conferred upon any board, and yet the Shipping Board is feverishly employing every conceivable means to obtain such powers and opportunities.

"8. That this bill does not require the Shipping Board to make any report or accounting to the President, the Congress, or anybody else, at any time.

"9. That when this country was in the midst of the war, the shipping interests who are back of this bill took advantage of the situation and ran ocean rates up on both their Government and the people as high as 1,250 per cent over pre-war rates, as admitted at the hearings by the general manager of the American Steamship Owners Association; and made what was characterized as 'almost fabulous' profits by W. J. Love and as 'enormous' by J. B. Smull, Messrs. Love and Smull being two of the $35,000 a year experts of the Shipping Board and vice presidents of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. For instance, the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. paid dividends of 200 per cent in 1916 and 405 per cent for 1917; the Luckenbach Steamship Co. made net profits on its capital of 236.2 per cent in 1916 and 666.9 per cent in 1917; the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. made 365.3 per cent net profit on its capital stock in 1915 to 1920; the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co. made net profits greater than its capital in 1915–1920, and during 1921, the very worst time in the history of shipping, according to its own annual report made a net income of $1,781,337, after deducting all expenses, taxes, interest, and losses on sale of Liberty bonds; the United Fruit Co. with a capital stock of $50,000,000 made net profits of $94,147,500 in 1915–1920, paid dividends of $77,080,277 and increased their surplus to $66,176,490; the Dollar Steamship Lines made net profits on its capital stock of 322.9 per cent in 1916 and 104.9 per cent in 1917; Robert Dollar, the owner of the Dollar Steamship Lines, in a recent article in Nation's Business, frankly states: 'I have always felt that a shipowner who must have "pap" from the Government does not deserve to be in the business. We do not need any advantage over the other fellow; we can take care of ourselves.'

"10. That most of the American steamship lines which are seeking and would receive the subsidies and other aids maintain an unnecessarily large force of high-paid executives, their salaries running as high as $100,000 a year, not only greater than the salary of the President of the United States, but out of all proportion to salaries paid in any other industry, especially considering the size and the amounts invested in the enterprises. The Seager Steamship Co. is a leading American line, organized in 1907 and having operated American flag ships to various European ports in the sharpest competition in the world; John C. Seager, sr., the president of the company, is said to be the oldest and one of the most highly esteemed shipping men in New York. John C. Seager, jr., the vice president and treasurer of the company, in a recent interview published in the Nautical Gazette, declared:

"Steamships purchased at the present time can be operated at a profit; foreign owners are not losing money, and there is no reason why an American owner can not make a profit with his ships. The most potent factor militating against the successful operation of American ships is the large overhead, which is incurred by the payment of large salaries to unnecessary executives. With few exceptions in Britain, there are no large salaries paid to steamship men in Europe, and if this example were followed in this country the balance sheets of the industry would make a better showing.

"11. That this bill authorizes the granting of subsidies and all other aids to the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and other large concerns which own and operate their own ships in the transportation of their own products and does not require them to operate their ships in whole or in part as common carriers.

"12. That Chairman Lasker demands both subsidies and booze, insisting that even with subsidies and aids granted by the ship subsidy bill American ships can not successfully operate unless they are also permitted to run saloons aboard. If Lasker's statements as to the necessity of subsidies are to be accepted, his statements as to the necessity of the sale of booze must also be accepted. Wherefore, nothing is to be gained merely by assuming the enormous additional burdens entailed by the pending bill. Consequently, in ascertaining the 'reaction' of their constituents, Members should ascertain whether they are not only willing to confer upon the shipping interests the enormous bounties provided by the pending bill but also authorize the sale of intoxicating liquors to those who are able to sail abroad, and at the same time prohibit such sales to those who remain on land. It is not merely a question of prohibition but a question of consistent law enforcement.

"It has just been announced in the press that Chairman Lasker will visit all the States in the Middle West in an effort to sell his ship subsidy bill to the farmers. If Chairman Lasker believes the propaganda which he has persistently been giving out to the effect that the farmers and the Middle West have been converted to his scheme and are actually wanting his bill passed, why does he intend to waste his time in going forth to evangelize them instead of remaining in Washington and performing his duties as chairman of the Shipping Board in an effort to improve the conditions which he delights to describe as deplorable? While we do not believe that he will find the farmers as gullible as some people in Washington, yet we realize that he is a genius in some particulars. He justly prides himself upon being a publicity expert, and we readily bear witness that he is also a promoter and schemer par excellence. He is perhaps the only man in America who could have come to Washington and captivated the President, overawed the Cabinet officers whose jurisdiction he sought to invade, chloroformed the Anti-Saloon League and prohibition commissioner, and otherwise paved the way for even the possibility of the passage of such a vicious measure as the pending ship subsidy bill, which is infinitely worse and more costly than any of the various ship subsidy bills which have been repudiated in the past."

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 27, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

LIBRARY BUILDING AND GROUNDS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 11393, which I favorably report, without amendment, from the Commitee on the Library. It is a bill to abolish the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds and transfer the duties thereof to the Architect of the Capitol and the Librarian of Congress.

I will say, before the bill is read for the information of the Senate, that this was a unanimous report from the Committee on the Library of the House, the bill was passed by the House, and there is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Library of the Senate. There are two letters, which I send to the desk, from the librarian, which I ask may be read to the Senate, and then that the report of the House Committee on the Library may simply be printed in the RECORD, if the bill is acted upon favorably, showing the reasons why the bill should be passed.

I now ask that the bill may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds is abolished on and after July 1, 1922. Thereafter the Architect of the Capitol shall have charge of all structural work at the Library Building and on the grounds, including all necessary repairs, the operation, maintenance, and repair of the mechanical plant and elevators, the care and maintenance of the grounds, and the purchasing and supplying of all furniture and equipment for the building. The employees required for the performance of the foregoing duties shall be appointed by the Architect of the Capitol. All other duties required to be performed by the Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds shall be performed thereafter under the direction of the Librarian of Congress, who shall appoint the employees necessary therefor. The position of administrative assistant and disbursing officer is hereby created in the Library of Congress, effective on July 1, 1922. The salary of such position shall be at the rate of $3,000 per annum, and appointments thereto shall be made by the librarian. The administrative assistant and disbursing officer shall disburse the appropriations for the Library of Congress and the Botanic Garden and shall perform such services in connection with the duties hereby imposed upon the librarian as he may direct, and shall give bond payable to the United States in the sum of $30,000, with sureties approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for the faithful discharge of his duties.

SEC. 2. That all books, documents, papers, furniture, and equipment of the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds shall be divided between and transferred to the Architect of the Capitol and the Library of Congress on the basis of duties transferred.

SEC. 3. That the appropriation of $3,600 for the fiscal year 1923 for the salary of the Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds is made available for the payment of the salary of the administrative assistant and disbursing officer at the rate of $3,000 per annum during such fiscal year. All appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 for the Library Building and Grounds shall be apportioned between, transferred to, and made available for the Architect of the Capitol and the Library of Congress on the basis of duties transferred. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1923 for printing and binding for the Library of Congress shall be apportioned between the Library of Congress and the Architect of the Capitol and that portion allotted to the building and grounds shall be transferred to and made available for the Architect of the Capitol. The appropriations and portions of appropriations herein transferred to the Architect of the Capitol, and all appropriations hereafter made to him on account of the Library Building and Grounds shall be disbursed for that purpose in the same manner as other appropriations under his control.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the communications read?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There are two letters from the Librarian advocating the passage of the bill and explaining it, but unless there is a call to have them read, I shall ask merely to have them printed in the RECORD, with the report of the House Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letters and the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
OFFICE OF THE LIBRARIAN,
Washington, June 19, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Chairman Committee on the Library, United States Senate.

MY CHAIRMAN: We entirely approve House bill 11393 now pending in the Senate, and especially desire its prompt enactment so that the changes provided for may take effect at the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1, 1922.

Very respectfully,

HERBERT PUTNAM,
Librarian of Congress.
HARRIET DE K. WOODS,
Superintendent of Library Building and Grounds.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
OFFICE OF THE LIBRARIAN,
Washington, June 26, 1922.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Chairman Committee on the Library, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: The inclosed report from the House Committee on the Library, which sets forth fully the reasons for the changes in jurisdiction proposed, should have been attached to the note which Mrs. Woods, the superintendent, and I addressed to you on June 19.

Faithfully yours,

HERBERT PUTNAM, Librarian.

[House of Representatives, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, Report No. 995.]

May 9, 1922, Mr. LUCE, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11393) to abolish the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds and to transfer the duties thereof to the Architect of the Capitol and the Librarian of Congress, having considered the same, report thereon favorably without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill was introduced and supported before the committee by the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. Legislation substantially identical with it was proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year.

Its appropriateness at this time is due to the fact that the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds is now, in effect, vacant, the present incumbent having resigned. The vacancy raises the question as to whether the structural and mechanical problems of the Library Building are to continue to be handled by an independent authority or that building be associated with the other legislative buildings on Capitol Hill, which as to such problems are in charge of the Architect of the Capitol.

1. The bill transfers to the Architect of the Capitol all such problems, including structural work, repairs, physical equipment, and the operation of the mechanical plant.

2. Abolishes the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds as an independent office.

3. Makes the Librarian explicitly responsible for the custody of the building and the safegnarding of it and its collections, and the mere "housekeeping"; providing him, however, with an "administrative assistant," who shall serve as his deputy in such matters, and shall also act as disbursing officer. This assistant would be appointed by him.

4. Provides in general terms for an immediate subdivision of the present subordinate staff, and of the appropriations appropriate to the above purposes, leaving the actual resultant subdivision to be expressed in the next appropriaiton act.

The consideration in favor of the changes are these:

When the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds was established in 1897, the building had just been completed. It had a completely independent plant for light, heating, and power. The engineer who had direct charge of its construction had shown remarkable ability and prudence, which Congress wished to retain in its service and in a suitable way reward. There was no certainty as to what type of man would become the permanent Librarian, and in any case he would probably be too fully absorbed in his duties as Librarian to care properly for the plant. He would certainly not be an engineer.

The office of Architect of the Capitol was then concerned solely with the routine maintenance problems of that building.

Accordingly Congress in 1897 created the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds, combining with it that of disbursing officer, made the position a presidential appointment, defined independent authority for it, and fixed the salary at $5,000, a sum then likely to secure a competent expert. The expert in view, Bernard Green, who had charge of the construction of the building, was then appointed to the position and held it until his death in 1914.

Since 1897 the situation has changed in these respects:

1. The Library has no longer an independent heat, light, and power plant. It is coupled up to the central power plant, since established. In this respect its technical problems have been reduced.

2. In another respect they have been enlarged, for the building, now a quarter of a century old, requires renewals, repairs, and at least interior additions, problems not for a mere mechanician or engineer but for an architect.

3. The salary of the position of superintendent is now only $3,600. It is not likely that for that sum the place can be filled or kept filled with a competent expert. In the hands of an incompetent the building will be imperiled.

4. In the meantime the office of Architect of the Capitol has developed. The Senate and House Office Buildings and the central power plant have been erected under his superintendency and placed in his charge. He has drafting rooms and testing laboratories, and in connection with these several buildings is contracting constantly for structural work, repairs, and material. He is directing the operation of mechanical plants similar to the plant still remaining in the Library. He is a $6,000 man, not a $3,600. He is, and is likely to be, expert in the technical problems involved and disposed to seek special expert aid when necessary. He has, and is likely to have, the confidence of Congress, so that his recommendations will carry weight.

With its mechanical and structural problems placed in his hands, the Library Building would secure a higher type of judgment, ampler resources, a more continuous responsibility, and a more authoritative presentation of its needs to Congress than through any independent direction likely under the present limitations.

5. Upon general considerations, also, the centralization of the overhead structural and mechanical problems of these four legislative buildings upon Capitol Hill seems theoretically sound and in the interest of both efficiency and economy.

With such problems taken over by the Architect of the Capitol as the bill provides, together with the portion of the superintendent's staff concerned with them, there remain of his present functions only three, viz:

1. The mere custodianship of the building, the safeguarding of it and its contents.
2. The "housekeeping," cleaning, etc.
3. The work of the disbursing office.

The responsibility for these is by the bill transferred to the Librarian, with an "administrative assistant" under him who shall act as his deputy.

This, also, is both logical and reasonable. The problems involved are properly domestic, and the responsibility for them is already generally assumed to be in the Librarian. It is quite just that he should be charged with it.

Regarding, however, as this committee must, the special interest of the Library Building itself, the committee is clear that it should now have the benefit of the larger resources and expert aid of the architect's office.

The committee is also clear that, with the specified functions as to the building transferred to him, the remaining responsibility as to it and its contents belongs properly to the Librarian. The provision for a deputy under him who shall also act as disbursing officer conforms to the general policy of law in the Government establishments. (See Rev. Stat., sec. 176.)

The Librarian, called by the committee, expressed himself definitely in favor of the bill. The Architect of the Capitol, also called, indicated his willingness to accept the additional duties. Both agreed that the relations proposed could be effectively worked out under the bill as drawn.

Your committee regards this legislation as highly desirable and immediately necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, returned to the Senate the message of the Senate informing the House that the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 831) to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain, by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 10101. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 297. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to call a conference of maritime nations with a view to the adoption of effective means for the prevention of pollution of navigable waters by oil-burning and oil-carrying steamers by the dumping into such waters of oil waste, fuel oil, oil sludge, oil slop, tar residue, and water ballast.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented petitions of sundry citizens of Harwood, Yakima, Toppenish, Ellensburg, and Outlook, all in the State of Washington, and of Condon, Oreg., praying that only a moderate rate of duty be imposed in the pending tariff bill on short cotton gloves, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PEPPER presented a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, praying for the passage of House Joint Resolution 314, proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States to prevent further issuance by the Government, the States, and municipal or local authorities of tax-exempt securities, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of House bill 11604, providing that 50 per cent of incoming immigrants shall be transported in American ships, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, praying for the passage of House bill 10860, to provide a uniform rule of naturalization and to amend and codify the laws relating to the acquisition and loss of citizenship, etc., with certain amendments, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9528) providing for the retention by the Government of the property in Nome, Alaska, known as the Detention Hospital Building, and its use by the Bureau of Education, Department of the Interior, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11298) amending existing law which authorizes the construction of a public building at Paris, Tex., so as to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a new site for same by exchanging therefor land and property now owned by the United States Government in said city, and to authorize the erection on said new site, when acquired, of a public building suitable for post-office purposes, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Out of order, I ask leave to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, for the calendar, and two reports which are adverse, from the same committee.

The Senators who introduced the bills adversely reported are not present, and I have no objection to their going upon the calendar, if the Senate consents to that course, in order that the Senators who introduced them may be present when the bills are considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be received.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 478) for the relief of Aaron Kibler, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 796) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each adversely:

A bill (S. 1040) authorizing the appointment of Anthony John Tittinger as captain of Cavalry; and

A bill (S. 2569) for the relief of Henry M. Williams.

The VICE PRESIDENT The bills will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3716) to define a period in which certain claims may be presented for determination to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for refund of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates of decedents under color of section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," and amendments, and to authorize payment of amounts allowed in the determination of such claims, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 795) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 3753) granting a pension to Sarah Sanderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3754) for the relief of Louis Leavitt; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 3755) for the relief of the Underwood Typewriter Co. (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3756) for the relief of the Cresmer Manufacturing Co. (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

INVESTIGATION OF CERTAIN OIL COMPANIES.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 311), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission investigate and report to the Senate respecting the ownership by persons who are not citizens of the United States of the shares of the Union Oil Co., a corporation of Delaware; the Union Oil Co., a corporation of California; and the Shell Oil Co., a corporation of California; the interrelations between said corporations; the interest of said corporations in other corporations in the United States; whether or not Great Britain, the British Dominions, Holland, Rumania, or other countries having oil lands within their territories, discriminate against American citizens with respect to the ownership of oil lands, or with respect to the ownership of shares in corporations which are organized to exploit and develop oil lands or engage in the production of petroleum; the acreage of oil lands in the United States which is held by lease or otherwise by said Union Oil Co., a corporation of Delaware, the Union Oil Co., a corporation of California, and the Shell Oil Co., a corporation of California and their subsidiary and affiliated companies; the acreage of oil lands which has been acquired by said corporations or any of them within the last year; and what measures are being pursued by said corporations to further extend their holdings of oil lands within the United States.

UNIT COSTS OF PRODUCTION AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 312), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas the contention is made that the duties imposed upon the importation of commodities by the pending tariff bill have been fixed for the purpose of equalizing the labor costs for the production of said commodities at home and abroad; and

Whereas the hearings which have been had upon the bill by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and by the Finance Committee of the Senate have not elicited any specific or dependable data or information as to the difference between the costs of production for said commodities at home and abroad, and particularly have not elicited any specific or dependable data or information with respect to the difference in the labor costs per unit of production of said commodities at home and abroad, or with respect to the price per unit obtained by the sale of such commodities in the home market; and

Whereas it is claimed and generally believed that many corporations, particularly manufacturing corporations, the products of which are given a protected preference in the home market, have realized great and inordinate profits, and that the tariff duties imposed by the pending bill may and will be used for the increase and aggrandizement of such profits; and

Whereas it is claimed that the greater the profits the greater is the demand for protection against competition, and the greater the importunity for imposing prohibitive duties upon imports for this purpose; and

Whereas the corporations which have appeared before the committees of Congress, demanding prohibitive and protective duties, have failed to advise Congress of the profits they have realized, the ratio of profits to capital invested, the ratio of profits to labor costs, or the rate of profits per unit of production; and

Whereas the beneficiaries of the duties imposed by the pending bill fail and refuse to furnish to Congress data and information respecting the matters in the premises set forth: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Tariff Commission is hereby directed to investigate and report to the Senate the costs of production per unit at home and abroad of the separate commodities upon which duties are imposed by the pending bill, and particularly to report the difference in the labor costs per unit of production of said commodities at home and abroad; the prices obtained per unit of said commodities at home and abroad; the profits realized per unit of production at home and abroad; the ratio of profits to capital invested in the production of such commodities at home and abroad; the ratio of profits to costs per unit of production of such commodities at home and abroad; and the ratio of profits to labor costs per unit of production of such commodities at home and abroad.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Schedule 7, agricultural products and provisions, page 99, beginning with paragraph 701.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In paragraph 701, page 99, line 6, after the word "cattle," the committee proposes to strike out "less than 2 years old, 1 cent per pound; 2 years old or over, 1¼ cents per pound," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Weighing less than 1,050 pounds each, 1¼ cents per pound; weighing 1,050 pounds each or more, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from North Dakota? The report on the War Department appropriation bill has been returned from the House with action taken by the House on certain amendments which were in technical disagreement, all of which I explained to the Senate on Friday last. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he would object to the consideration of that report at this time, in order that we may clean the matter up?

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator if this is one of the bills which it is necessary to pass before the 1st of July?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, it has to be disposed of before the 1st of July. I ask the Senator if there will be any lengthy discussion on the subject?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are six or seven amendments to amendments of the Senate, in which the Senate is invited to concur. One of them may give rise to some debate. I do not think it will be lengthy. It is an amendment to the Muscle Shoals amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. That matter has always involved lengthy discussion. It may be that it has been discussed until the discussion has run out. I can not say.

Mr. WARREN. The merits of the case can not enter into the discussion now, because it is a mere matter of time as to when the money shall be expended.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask to have the tariff bill temporarily laid aside, but I want to reserve the right to object if the discussion on the House amendment appears to be too lengthy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, with that understanding, may I ask that the action of the House be laid before the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want any misunderstanding on the part of the Senator from North Dakota. I hope there will be no lengthy debate. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is right when he says the merits of the Muscle Shoals proposition do not enter into the House amendment, but the Senator from North Dakota knows that in debating the question Senators can debate the merits without a violation of the rule. I hope that will not be done, but it can not be guaranteed that it will not be done. I sincerely trust it will not take long, but there is a possibility that it will take quite a while. The amendment by the House will raise a contest.

Mr. McCUMBER. I attempted to guard myself in reserving the right to object to a further consideration of the report if I found it was going to take an unreasonable length of time. The Muscle Shoals proposition has been discussed pro and con for several years. It seems to me that it would be a waste of time to have further prolonged discussion upon the subject. I hope it will be disposed of in a short time. I am yielding simply because this is the 27th of June and, of course, the appropriation bills should be disposed of before the 1st of July.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 10871, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 106, 131, 199, and 214 to the bill H. R. 10871, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 41, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$2,100,940."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 65, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert: "All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That under this provision no amount shall be used for the employment of any additional persons over the number for which the specific appropriations herein provide."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 220, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "including personal services."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 221, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$16,600."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 225, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "to be immediately available," and in lieu thereof insert "but not to become available until the 1st day of October, 1922."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 230, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"For the fiscal year 1924 and annually thereafter moneys allotted to the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers by the Veterans' Bureau for support, maintenance, and care of World War veterans shall not be used to augment the appropriations made for the support of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

"The provision in this act that 'the Governor of the Panama Canal, so far as the expenditure of appropriations contained in this act may be under his direction, shall, when it is more economical, purchase needed materials, supplies, and equipment from available surplus or reserve stocks of the War Department' shall not apply as to reserve stock where purchases are made for the Panama Canal proper."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the amendments of the Senate numbered 41, 65, 220, 221, and 230. That is exclusive of the Muscle Shoals amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That leaves only Senate amendment 225. Senate amendment numbered 225 has to do with the appropriation of $7,500,000 for continuing construction work on Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals. Under the Senate language this sum was to be made immediately available. It was necessary to report this technically in disagreement in order to give the House of Representatives an opportunity to vote separately upon the Muscle Shoals appropriation. That was done, but in doing so the House adopted an amendment to the Senate amendment. It struck out the words "to be immediately available" and in lieu thereof inserted "but not to become available until the 1st day of October, 1922," in other words, postponing the beginning of the construction until next October, thereby letting this summer go by.

My personal view is that that was a mistake. I think it rather a pity that the Government should lose this summer season in recommencing work upon that dam. There seems to have been a good deal of contention and confusion in the House of Representatives about the question and another amendment was offered, more drastic than this, providing for a further postponement and providing also other conditions. It was defeated, but the amendment which I have just read was adopted by the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if he is going to make a motion to insist on the amendment of the Senate and ask for a further conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, I had not intended doing that.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of making such a motion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. With that understanding, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment numbered 225 and ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I presume the Senator from Nebraska wishes to discuss his motion first. I should like to say a word or two in reference to it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not particular as to when I shall speak. If the Senator from New York or the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator desires to discuss it first, I am not anxious to go ahead with the discussion.

Mr. President, I have never been particularly anxious, when I have attempted to address the Senate, to have Senators all here. I am anxious, however, that the Members of the Senate hear whatever argument I may make on this question, because it is to them that I wish to direct my remarks.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	McCumber	Smoot
Ball	Glass	McLean	Spencer
Borah	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Sutherland
Calder	Heflin	Nicholson	Trammell
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Underwood
Colt	Kendrick	Oddie	Wadsworth
Culberson	Keyes	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Ladd	Pittman	Warren
Curtis	La Follette	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Dillingham	Lodge	Rawson	Willis
du Pont	McCormick	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Gooding	Simmons	Stanley	Watson, Ga.
Pepper

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Cameron	Smith	Swanson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope Senators will give me their attention for a short time. When it had the Army appropriation bill under consideration the Senate adopted an amendment which read:

For the continuance of the work on Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, Ala., to be immediately available, $7,500,000.

The House has agreed to that amendment with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "to be immediately available" and insert the words "but not to become available until the 1st day of October, 1922." My motion is—and it is the pending motion—that the Senate disagree to the House amendment to the Senate amendment and insist on the Senate amendment and ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

It narrows down to this, which is the contention and what is involved in this motion: The Senate appropriated $7,500,000 to be immediately available. So far as I can see now the words "to be immediately available" amount to nothing and could be stricken out without affecting the question, because the 1st of July is so near at hand. When the amendment was offered, however, it was supposed that the Army appropriation bill would become a law some time before the 1st of July, and the Government would not need to wait until the 1st of July to begin the work on the dam; but the House has added an amendment to the effect that the money shall not be available until the 1st day of next October, which means, of course, if the Senate shall agree to the House amendment, that work shall not commence until the 1st day of October.

Of all the seasons of the year, Mr. President and Senators, when work can be prosecuted to advantage at Muscle Shoals it is between the 1st of July and the 1st of October when the river is low. The House amendment, in effect, says the money is appropriated, but it shall not be used and work shall not be commenced until the water comes up, when the work will be more expensive and more difficult to carry on. That is the effect of it. It says: "You can go ahead with Muscle Shoals, but you shall not work on it when the river is low, from July to October."

The engineers who have had charge of this great work down there have said that it will take three years to complete this dam, and the principal reason why it will take three years is because that will give the officials having charge of its construction an opportunity to work during three seasons of low water. They can not do the work that has to be done on the bed of the river in one season or two seasons. They could complete the work quicker if there were more low water in the river; but remember, Senators, that the weak point in the Muscle Shoals power proposition, the only weak point that it has, is the great variance between the maximum and the minimum flow of the Tennessee River. It goes down during the dry season, so that a part of the year there would be even less than 100,000 horsepower developed, and at maximum flow, during a small part of the year, it goes so high that over a million horsepower could be developed there. I mention that only to show you the difference between the high flow and the low flow of the Tennessee River, so that it is extremely desirable as a matter of economy, if we are going to complete that dam, that we do as much work as possible while the river is low.

The question at once arises, Why should the House make such an amendment? It was supported by Representatives led in the main by those from Alabama, and some from Michigan. It is admittedly done in the interest of Mr. Ford, and the charge was made in the debate on the floor of the House that the Senate amendment was in opposition to Mr. Ford; that really there was a trick placed over here by those who favor this amendment, and that those who favor it were deceived, and induced in that way to vote for this amendment. Their theory is that if they can go back to work down there, if those who are opposing Government operation of it can make it as expensive as possible for the Government to construct, they will get adherents to the Ford propaganda, and that as a last result the Congress will be compelled to surrender to that propaganda.

Mr. President, I have been told to-day, since the Senate has been in session, by a Senator who is now present in the Chamber, that he had a telegram from Gray Silver—who, as you all know, is the legislative representative of the American Farm Bureau—stating that the farmers expected him to support the House proposition. Mr. Silver has been very active in it in the name of the farmers of America. In my judgment, he is misrepresenting them. In my judgment, he can not defend his course I can not understand how any man can defend the action taken by the House in this matter, whether he be for Ford or whether he be for anybody else.

It will be remembered that the amendment I offered, that went into this bill, was offered as a committee amendment. It came from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It was agreed upon unanimously by the members of that committee, and some of the strongest advocates of Mr. Ford's proposition are on that committee, as strong as any in the Senate or in the House. It was agreed upon long before the Army appropriation bill was reported to Congress. It was given publicity. It was announced through all the papers that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had agreed on that amendment, and had directed its chairman to offer that amendment when the Army appropriation bill came up. There was nothing covered up about it. Everybody understood it. As far as I knew, everybody that was in favor of the development of Muscle Shoals, whether he was for Ford or whether he was for anybody else, whether he was in favor of leasing it or whether he was in favor of the Government operating it, agreed that that was the proper thing to do. There was no deception; and any insinuation, any claim that there was any trick, that there was any attempted trick, that there was any attempt at coercion, any attempt at secrecy, any attempt at anything unfair, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false and without any foundation, direct or indirect, to sustain it. I make that assertion measuring my words. I make it in the presence of members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, Democrats and Republicans alike; and I ask them, if in any particular that statement is wrong, to rise now and make the correction.

It was a fair agreement. It was understood all around that we wanted to develop Muscle Shoals. It was known that there would be a sharp disagreement as to what the policy of the Government should be in regard to it, but nobody objected to that agreement; and there were from the House committee a great many Members—I think as many as there were from the Senate committee—that went down to Muscle Shoals. We were there together. We went over the whole thing; and I have yet to hear from the first Member of the House but that he agreed, no matter whether he was for Ford or for anybody else, that the Government ought at once to go ahead and start that work. As far as I know, that has never been disputed, and any charge now that anybody was trying to take advantage comes, it seems to me, with ill grace and poor grace. No sportsman would ever make such a charge, even in a gambling game, where everything had been so open and aboveboard and everybody understood and everything was known.

Remember, Mr. President, that the Government has down there all the machinery and in a great many respects the material on hand ready to start work to-morrow. It has a railroad track built across the river and false work built around the place where the engineers expect to commence the further building of the dam, in one place covering 13 acres of the bed of that river, surrounded by a watertight cofferdam. When the work was suspended a year ago for lack of appropriation, in order to protect that work and not let it deteriorate unnecessarily they opened up a hole through the cofferdam and let in the water as a matter of preservation, so that the pressure should be equal on both sides. It is ready to be pumped out and the hole filled up and work commenced. That will cost something. That would not have been necessary if we had not suspended operations in the first place.

At other places in the dam other cofferdams are constructed. They build a cofferdam around a portion of the area where they are going to construct a dam and get the water all out of it, down to bedrock, where they commence the construction of the dam. It does not take an engineer or a scientist to see that it is desirable to do that when the water is low. It does not take a seer to understand that if we keep postponing it a few years this work, that never was intended to be permanent, that it is intended to remove out of the river as soon as the dam is constructed, will not last forever. It is liable to go out at any time; and since it will take three years to complete it, it is perfectly apparent that even if it does not go out now, if a delay puts it over another year, it may go out next year or the year after and still do as much damage as though it went out to-morrow.

That is the condition down there at Muscle Shoals. There are two or three million dollars' worth of material and of work, all of which are liable to be lost if we delay work beyond the low-water period of the river, and the House amendment says you must wait until the low-water period is past before you can turn a hand or do a stroke of work.

I want to say just a word now to those who are opposed to the Government doing anything down there, to the Government owning and maintaining this dam to make this great nitrate plant effective. Just a word about that.

Do you want to take this course in order to make the work of the Government expensive? Because you are opposed to this method or that method, are you going to adopt a technical course that will result in adding as much as possible to the cost in order to obstruct the completion of that great dam? That is the effect of this, whether you want to do it or not. That is just exactly what is happening. It means, Mr. President, one year of delay if the House amendment is agreed to. That really means two years. Whether Ford gets it or whether any other bidder gets it who will step into the Government's shoes, if they do get it, they will suffer the same liability to loss. The only difference is, for instance, if Ford gets it, and that work goes out, it will cost $2,000,000 more to put it in, and the Government foots the bill, because it is by appropriation that Ford gets his money to build the dam. So it does not make any difference. The danger is just as great, no matter whether the Government does it or somebody else does it. It is inconceivable that we would stop now, when we are one-third through with that dam, with all this work there, and turn it over to somebody, and that they would not utilize the machinery and take advantage of the work that has already been done. Everybody concedes that whoever gets it, if he is going to be economical, will step into the Government's shoes and continue that work.

So, Mr. President, it reduces itself to this: Shall we wait until the water is high before we commence to do this work, when it will cost more money? Suppose it is a physical possibility for the Government or anybody else to do this work when the river is at its height. It would more than double and treble the expense. The Army engineers were doing work that was low down. They had to have the river bed bared in order to make it solid and complete and avoid any possible mistake. Their idea was to build these cofferdams and bare the bed of the river, and do the work at a time when the water was low. They could make heavier construction; instead of putting it in 12 feet wide they might put it in 24 feet wide, and fill that up to the top and make it water-tight, and pump the water out of it. It is possible to be done, but you can see what a tremendous increase it would make in the expense. The Government's engineers were working on the theory that when they constructed this from the river bed up, then they could work on top of it. They would spend the rest of the year in working on the portion of the dam that was above the high-water flow of the river. They have done that already. They have a portion of the dam practically complete up to the place where they put in the gates and the roadway above it, away above where the river will come at its highest time. They can work on a place of that kind, but they can not go down in the bed of the river and do the work economically or to any advantage at any other time than during the summer months and early fall.

Mr. President, I can not conceive, I can not understand, how anybody can say that he favors the House amendment. I can appreciate the condition of a man's mind who says, "I do not want any appropriation made. I am in favor of blowing out what we have there so as not to obstruct navigation, and let it all go." I do not agree with that man; but he has a definite idea in his mind; he has a definite policy which he wants to follow, and he does not want to deviate from it. But I can not understand a man who says, "I want that power development. I want Muscle Shoals Dam No. 2 constructed. I want this great work continued, and I want to save the money which the Government has in it. I want to save the structure that is built down there for the purpose of making this dam," and he then says, "I do not want anything done when the water is low." I can not see the consistency in those positions.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I agree with every word that has been said by the Senator from Nebraska; but it is suggested as a reason why the Senate might concur in the House amendment that should the matter go back to the House those who are opposed to any further work on the dam may obstruct this particular amendment placed in the bill by the Senate, so that it may be defeated altogether; and it would be better to wait three months than to have the matter altogether thrown out. What would the Senator from Nebraska say as to the probability of that taking place?

Mr. NORRIS. I will take that up, Mr. President. I do not know how other Senators may feel about it, but I am not in favor of putting the Government in the position of seeing how expensive it can make this work. I would rather not do it. I want to do the work with economy; I want to do it in a scientific way. To agree to the House amendment means either that we are going to work at a time when we can not work economically and to advantage, or it means the postponement of all work for another year.

Personally, I will say frankly to the Senator from Virginia, I would much prefer to take the amendment out of the bill entirely and let it stand for another year where it is now than to put the Government in the awkward position of having to spend two dollars where it ought to spend only one. The risk we run if we do that is what we will run if we accept the amendment; that is all the work which the Government has done in the way of construction of cofferdams, and so forth, may go out any time; we all know it will go out at some time. It is not intended to be permanent, and the question is whether it will stand while Congress is delaying.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to know if the Senator can suggest the reason for delaying the work until October. There must have been some reason for the House's action. I would like to know whether the Senator can tell us.

Mr. NORRIS. The arguments made in the House were not all printed; a great many of the speeches were held out. I do not know whether they were printed this morning or not, but the argument seems to have been that the Senate was taking an advantage. I could not see any reason on which that position was based, but it was contended that the amendment was put in by the Senate in a sort of a spirit of deception; that it was taking advantage of the Ford people; and they want to force a vote and force the Government to give this to Mr.

Ford before the present session of Congress ends. The only possible reason back of the arguments I have read was that if we decided to let the Government go on with this construction, Congress would not decide the ultimate policy of the Government as quickly as it would if they awarded it and threw this monkey wrench into the machinery.

Mr. GLASS. Will not the Government be compelled to do this work in any event, whether it accepts the Ford proposition or not?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Under the Ford offer the Government would have to furnish the money.

Mr. GLASS. The Government has to pay for it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; but of course the Government could let it out to somebody. There is one bidder who agrees to build the dam at its own expense and take it under the regular water-power act now in force.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, is the Senator advised sufficiently in reference to the construction to know whether, in case it is postponed until the 1st of October, there is other work, aside from the work in the cofferdam, which could be carried on if the water were too high at that time to do that work advantageously, and then from time to time, as the river recedes, to work in the cofferdam?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the Senator as I understand the situation. That is a very proper question, but I have not looked it up in detail this morning, and I am speaking now from my memory of the situation down there. I think there are places on the dam where the Government could work without first commencing a foundation; they have some partly constructed. But the point I want the Senate to get is that it will take three dry seasons to do the work on the bed of the river. As the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] suggests to me, if it stands for a year beyond that the material is likely to rot out and be carried away by high water. So that it means that we could not systematically carry out the plans of the engineers in the construction of this great dam, because they would have to wait another year. In other words, they have figured it all out; that during one dry season they can cover so much of the river bed, and there is river bed enough there to take up three dry seasons.

There is no way to get away from that, following their plans. Of course, I have followed experts and engineers, because I am not an expert or an engineer myself; but that stands undisputed. In the plan laid out for construction there are required three years of construction on the bed of the river during the dry seasons. During the balance of the time of those three years they can complete the superstructure. So that we will be losing a year if we pass over one of those dry seasons, and we will be utilizing a force then, even if we can go on and work, that later on will be laid off, and the machinery and the whole force disrupted and thrown out of joint. So it simply means millions of extra expense, even though all the cofferdams and every bit of their construction remain there intact, and there is serious doubt of that, because one year has gone now. If we let a year go by, as it takes three years to construct it, it will mean that we will be doing that work for five years.

The high water is likely to wash away the railroad bridge itself. We have a railroad bridge built right along the face of that dam, so that the material we put into that dam is taken there on cars, and the Government owns all the cars and owns the engines. Right there in front of that dam on the island we own one of the greatest mixing plants that has ever been constructed in the history of the world, with a railroad running to it, and another one running over here, farther down the island, for the material that will be stored up there, some of which is there now.

Of course, there is always a risk in that kind of work. To put that risk into five years instead of three is not wise, because deterioration may come, accidents may happen. There are wooden structures to rot out and decay, and high water will come and carry it away. Nobody, it seems to me, who wants to be fair, no matter where he stands on this proposition, would advocate losing this year. I do not want to argue the future policy of the Government now; it is not involved here. The Members of the House who have investigated it and seen it, and the members of the Senate committee, had all agreed that that was the statesmanlike course to pursue, and that that was the economical thing to do.

I was told by a Senator that another man came to him and proposed the same thing I told the Senate a few minutes ago was given to me by another Member of this body, as to what we ought to do. Regardless of propaganda, regardless of false reports that go out, I appeal to Senators in the interest of the taxpayers of the country, I appeal to you even in the interest of Mr. Ford's proposition, not to agree to the House amendment, and postpone this work longer. I am appealing for the taxpayers when I appeal to Mr. Ford's friends, because under Mr. Ford's proposition, whatever may be the cost, the taxpayers pay it. Ford does not put up any money under his proposition. It is all contributed by appropriation from the Public Treasury. We are all interested in seeing that work done, in seeing that the property of the Government down there is not destroyed. If Mr. Ford's proposition is agreed to, all this property I have mentioned becomes his—goes to him. If you are thinking only of Ford, not of the people, of the taxpayers, we are going to preserve his property if he gets this proposition, and there is absolutely nothing in the Senate amendment which takes away any rights, prospective or otherwise, of Mr. Ford or any other bidder.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have heard only a part of the Senator's statement, and I gather from the part which I have heard that he feels that this improvement should be completed, and that whether Mr. Ford's proposition is accepted or some other disposition is made of this project, nothing of value can be accomplished, so far as relief is concerned, unless that dam is completed, and the sooner it is completed the more quickly we will get results, no matter who may have it. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when the time comes to vote, I intend to vote to concur in the House amendment; but I want to say that, in my judgment, the House amendment is most unfortunate. I am not here to combat what the Senator from Nebraska has said in reference to this amendment. I shall vote for the House amendment for other reasons.

I read so much of the debate in the House as was published, and I gather from the debate that the opposition as expressed on the floor of the House was that they did not want this money to become available until a vote was taken on the Ford offer, and it was implied that the passage of this appropriation would interfere with the Ford offer. My mind may be very dull, I may lack comprehension, but I fail to see how the passage of this appropriation of seven and a half million dollars to finish Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals can affect the Ford offer one way or the other. In the event that Mr. Ford's proposition is accepted, it seems to me clear that it is helpful to Mr. Ford's offer to have some money immediately available to go on and finish the dam.

Mr. Ford's offer proposes to pay interest on the money that is necessary to complete the dam, and then pay the cost of the dam at the end of a hundred years. Therefore all the work that is done on the dam before Mr. Ford's offer is accepted relieves Mr. Ford of paying the interest on that amount. So I can not see how this affects adversely any proposal made by Mr. Ford in the matter. I am sure that a large number of the men in the House who voted for the amendment voted for it in the belief that they were aiding the Ford proposal. I do not question their sincerity about the matter, but the logic and the reasoning they have behind them I can not agree to, because I see nothing in it.

I think we have all about come to the conclusion now that, no matter what happens, Dam No. 2 should be finished, in the interest of the people of America and the Treasury of the United States. We would then make what is now a junk heap, as it stands in the river to-day, an available asset of the Federal Government. I do not combat what the Senator from Nebraska has said in reference to the cost of the delay. I have regretted the delay in the finishing of the dam all the time, and I regret this additional delay.

Mr. President, I do not know how I can express my position in reference to the matter better than by stating what one of my colleagues from a western State said to me yesterday about the appropriation for the Muscle Shoals dam. He said, "UNDERWOOD, I fear you are gun-shy on Muscle Shoals." I fear that I am. Repeatedly I have stood for an appropriation in the Senate to accomplish this great work. Repeatedly the Senate has acted favorably. Repeatedly the matter has gone to the House and been rejected and no result has come. Although I give due credit to the sincerity of purpose of most of the men who voted to put this amendment on the proposition, I can not help feeling that there are some men who favor the House amendment because they desire to defeat the whole appropriation and put the whole thing out of the bill.

I know the practical result of doing that. A year ago last March the Senate put on the sundry civil appropriation bill an appropriation of $10,000,000 to proceed with the work. The House rejected it. The Senate stood firm until 1 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March in favor of the appropriation and the completion of the work. Then, because we could not afford to destroy a great supply bill, a situation that endangered the workings of the Government, we were compelled to yield. We are in identically that same position now. Here is one of the greatest appropriation bills of the Government. It is a bill that must go through by the 1st day of July or we will have no money appropriated to feed our soldiers. We can not delay a War Department bill. We have to pass it. I fear that if the Senate rejects the House amendment and we go to conference the House will stand on its position, and in the end the Senate conferees will have to come back here, as the Senate conferees came on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and say "We have to yield on this whole amendment because we can not defeat the supply bill."

We have waited so long for the money to continue the appropriation that I feel it is better to wait three months longer than to endanger the entire appropriation and take the possibility of losing the money that will enable us to go on and complete Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals. Therefore I shall vote against the motion of the Senator from Nebraska. I regret to do it because I feel that he has acted with absolute fairness and aboveboard in the matter. I have no criticism of the position he has taken, but I feel that we can not afford to jeopardize the matter longer. I think it puts us in too much danger if we carry the matter back into conference. Therefore I hope that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska may be voted down and that the Senate may concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield that the Senator from Ohio may ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Did I correctly understand the Senator to the effect that he does not feel that the House amendment should be adopted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. I said that I feel that we should reject the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, which is to disagree to the House amendment, and that then we should concur in the House amendment, because I fear, although I do not agree to the wisdom of the amendment, that we will jeopardize the whole appropriation if we do not agree to it.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the point I had in mind. I understood the Senator to doubt the wisdom of the House amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to know what the reason is for delaying until October 1 the use of this money which ordinarily would be available July 1?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the Senator why. He may not have heard the first part of my remarks, in which I said I saw no justification for the delay. The reason why I am in favor of concurring in the House amendment is because I think we endanger the entire appropriation if we do not concur in the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Why would it delay this proposition if the bill is recommitted to conference because the majority of us are of the same mind as the Senator from Alabama? I confess I am in doubt about it, but I do know that we can go along with river improvements very much better in low water than we can in high water. It seems to me that that is a commonsense proposition, and if that is true, I confess I can not see any reason why the use of this money should be delayed until October 1 if we agree that it should be used at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not contest that point, and I have not contested it I say that the Senate has been endeavoring for a long time to complete the work. That is the position which has been taken by the Senate as a body. But every time we have proposed to appropriate money to complete the work we have met defeat at the hands of the House. Now the House has agreed to this appropriation with a limitation which will delay it three months. I think it is the part of wisdom for those who want to have the dam finished to accept the delay and make a certainty of the appropriation.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not object to a proper limitation being placed upon expenditures after we have agreed to make them. If there is any reason for this limitation I would like to hear it. I have not heard it thus far.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my innermost sympathies are with the Senator from Nebraska, but the practical situation which confronts us, and it is a very practical one, impels me to follow the advice of the Senator from Alabama. The matter was debated at considerable length in the House of Representatives, and two amendments were offered, the first by Mr. HUDDLESTON, which goes much further than the one which was finally adopted and which, from my standpoint, and I speak only for myself, is infinitely more objectionable than the one finally agreed to. That amendment was defeated by a majority of only 14 in the House.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what the amendment was?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall read it to the Senate. After striking out the words "providing that the appropriation should be immediately available," it added this language to the Senate proposition:

Provided, however, This appropriation shall not become available until such time as the Congress shall have taken final action on H. R. 11903—

That is the Ford bill—

and not then if the subject matter of said bill is enacted into law in a manner as will result in the consummation of contracts for lease and sale of the Government Muscle Shoals properties to Henry Ford, and in which event said appropriation shall be available in carrying out by the Government the provisions of the contracts as to such lease and sale: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to postpone such availability later than January 1, 1923.

That was defeated by only 14 majority. I repeat, I speak only for myself. That amendment is highly objectionable to me. The amendment which was adopted, which was introduced by Mr. JAMES, and which we are now discussing, was adopted by a majority of 40 in the House. We may protest against it, and I for one do protest against its wisdom, but——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to state that while it is true the majority was 40, there were only about one-half of the Members of the House present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There were 180 absentees, and there is nothing in the present situation which would lead us to believe that there will be less than 180 absentees to-morrow or the next day or the day following. This must be done in the next two or three days, if we disagree and insist upon our original amendment.

As I said, the amendment which we are now discussing was adopted by the House, after considerable debate, on a record vote by 40 majority. We may discuss the matter and protest against it, as I do myself. I think it an unwise amendment. But as I stand here I believe we will not persuade the House to reverse itself. As the Senator from Alabama indicated, we will simply get the thing into such a snarl that the whole thing will die. Suppose we vote to-day to insist upon our amendment. It goes back to conference. The three House conferees, of course, will be powerless to agree in conference on the original Senate language. They will have to take it back to the House again and have a separate vote.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the House asked for a conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it has not.

Mr. LENROOT. So the House would have an opportunity to vote directly upon the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the House would vote directly, of course, upon the amendment. But personally, and I am speaking only from the practical standpoint, I do not believe we can persuade the House to reverse itself after it has made a record vote of 40 majority in favor of the amendment. I think the amendment is unfortunate. It is going to lose three months' time in the most favorable season of the year for continued work on the dam, but if we concur in the amendment we are taking something that is certain. If we reject the amendment and force a conference, we have nothing in front of us but uncertainty and possible defeat of the entire project for a year to come instead of only three months. That is the practical thing for us to consider. It is upon that ground and that ground alone that I join with the Senator from Alabama in opposition to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that we disagree and insist upon our original amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Is there any cash already appropriated and available for the work or for such work as may be done between now and October 1 next?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not one penny. This is the only money that may be made available for continuing the work at any time. As the Senator from Alabama said, it is either three months from now or perhaps not for a year from now. We must choose between the two. If we get this thing into a snarl and finally reach a complete disagreement and the Senate is compelled at midnight of June 30, in the face of another record vote in the House, to recede again, we will have to recede on the whole amendment and lose the $7,500,000 completely. I think it is not the part of wisdom to do that. I can not agree with the Senator from Nebraska upon that point. The Senator from Nebraska thinks it is wiser to fail entirely in getting the $7,500,000 and to let the matter go over a whole year than to take $7,500,000 to be available three months from now. I can not agree with that. I think the quicker we get the money the better.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator from New York closes I desire to make a suggestion to him. In my judgment the Senator has not fully considered what this amendment means and what the three months' delay means. The Senator says he can not agree with me in the proposition that I had rather see the amendment fail. The reason I say that is because I believe it would be more economical to let it all fail and to commence and carry on the work down there when it may be prosecuted continuously. The engineers think they will have to spend three years on the work in the bed of the river anyway, and they have made their plans so that they could utilize the force and keep everything going for an entire year. But if they are not allowed to proceed in that way, and we make it necessary for them to go on in violation of that plan and not use the money when the river is low, then they will have to wait until they have another season of low water in the river, or they will have to do the work when the river is high and pay a larger sum of money—the taxpayers' money.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no doubt that if we agree to the House amendment it will probably cost a little more money than it would had the original Senate amendment been adopted; but let me remind the Senator from Nebraska that even if this sum should become available on July 1 it is going to take the Army engineers quite a while to start the work again. They have got to get their labor gangs together and organize them, and the work is not going to start on July 2.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that the engineers assumed even before we passed the amendment, when they knew of this understanding here because of the publicity which was given to it, and there appearing to be no objection to it, while they spent no money, they took such action that the getting together of the working force is merely a question of a few days.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not contending that the House amendment is wise; I want the Senator to understand that; my sympathy is with him; but we are facing a practical situation. I imagine that some work may be done after the 1st of October toward the completion of this dam. I should not say that the season of high water occurs as early as that. So it is altogether probable that if we concur in the House amendment and work is begun on October 1 substantial progress may be made before the winter floods come.

In addition to that, the work may be prosecuted next May and June, still inside of the fiscal year, and undoubtedly some work may be done during the winter months on the superstructure. So while we shall lose a portion of it three months, and probably it is uneconomical and not businesslike, yet we are confronted with this practical question: Shall we accept a certainty by concurring in this amendment or go on with an uncertainty for an indefinite period?

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, the Senator from New York thinks that the adoption of the House amendment will only delay the work for three months. I was a member of the subcommittee that went down to make an investigation of the Muscle Shoals project. The one thing which we agreed upon was that, unless work could begin there promptly so as to utilize three or four months during this summer, the whole project would be delayed for an entire year. That was one thing that the committee unanimously agreed upon. So it is not a question of delaying the work for three months but it is a question of delaying the work for one entire year if it is provided that the appropriation shall not become available until the 1st of October.

I was one of the few who voted in the House of Representatives two years ago for the proposed appropriation of $10,000,000 to proceed with the construction of Dam No. 2. That was before I went to Muscle Shoals and saw the project. We have already lost two years by not taking the appropriate action at that time, and, in addition, we have lost millions and millions of dollars on the project itself. If Senators would go down there and see the condition of the cofferdams to-day they would realize how fast they are decaying and how soon they will have to be entirely rebuilt from the bottom up and would appreciate how great a loss the Government will sustain by not immediately proceeding with the construction of the dam and bringing it to completion. I make the prophecy now that the one year's delay which will be brought about if the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate shall be concurred in, will mean a loss of two or three million dollars because of the deterioration and decay which will ensue if the work on the cofferdams and other works is delayed.

That applies also to the railroad tracks. There is an entire railroad track clear across that river and paralleling the bank which is rotting; it is going to decay, and a year's or two years' delay will necessitate the rebuilding of that railroad. To delay the construction work for a year means, in my judgment, a loss of at least $2,000,000 to the Government on account of the damage which will be caused, and the delay of three months in the time when the appropriation shall become available in reality will mean the delay of a year.

So I am where I was before; in fact, I am where I was two years ago; I am in favor of appropriating this money and letting this work start at once.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of the circumstances I feel that I ought to say something. I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture which reported out the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to appropriate $7,500,000 to carry on the work on the dam; and I am the author of the original bill which appropriated the money to provide an adequate supply of explosive materials for the Government during times of war. It developed by investigation that we were completely at the mercy of Chile, and that in case the Chilean nitrate beds should be blockaded we would find ourselves with a tremendous Army and equipment, but without explosives. So I have followed this development with a great deal of interest, and I do not believe there is another Senator here who is any more deeply interested in the project than am I.

There is a disposition in both parties, to a less degree in the Senate and to a greater degree, perhaps, at the other end of the Capitol, to let this matter go; but I wish to reenforce what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said and what the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has said. So far as the deterioration of this property is concerned, within three months surely the engineers will address themselves to those things that need immediate attention and will utilize such an amount of the appropriation as is necessary to protect any part of the works that is rapidly decaying. So, in any event, so far as deterioration is concerned, at the end of the three months we will have the appropriation available to take care of that.

So far as the construction of the dam is concerned, of course that would be dependent upon the time when the frost comes, for it is almost impossible to lay cement during the freezing or cold weather period; but as to the other portions of the work which may go to decay and cause a loss, they can be taken care of at the expiration of the 90 days, or the care of them may be begun.

The danger in this whole proposition is that if we do not accept the House amendment we jeopardize not only the time element that is involved but we may lose the entire appropriation, and it may result finally in the abandonment of the entire project. So nothing can be lost by this delay except whatever progress would be made on the construction of the dam.

As to losing a year and endangering the whole project by decay and floods, immediately upon the availability of the money in October the railroad may be repaired, and the cofferdams, wherever there is a weak point, may be strengthened, and all necessary provision can be made to prevent further deterioration. But "to make assurance double sure" I sincerely hope the Senate will accept the House amendment. I do not agree that it was wise. In the committee I asked the engineers if, in their judgment, this would interfere with any proposed contract with Mr. Ford or anybody else. Of course, they said "no," because, whether a contract is given to anybody, this work has got to be completed and payments for the cost must be arranged by the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to have some statement which would satisfy my reason in this matter. This is the situation as I conceive it: Both the Senate and the House have agreed that this work ought to go on and ought to be completed. That is also my judgment about it. Therefore the two Houses have agreed to appropriate $7,500,000. Thus far both Houses are in agreement. Senators, including the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], have said that they feel the House amendment is a very unwise one and they do not approve it. What is there in the situation that makes the Senator believe that, while the House has approved the appropriation of $7,500,000 for the completion of this project, they are insistent that not one penny shall be expended before October 1, and that rather than let a penny of it be expended prior to October 1 they will defeat the entire appropriation?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in answer to that question, I will say that I think the Senator ought to turn his proposition around, for the House has agreed that on the 1st day of October this work may go on, and the Senate has agreed that it should start the 1st of July. Why should we insist on our position, when there is no very great loss, when by insistence we shall jeopardize the whole appropriation and maybe lose it?

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator came from New England, I would expect him to answer my question by asking a question, but, coming from South Carolina, I should like a direct answer.

Mr. SMITH. I will give the Senator a direct answer. I believe that the project is so worthy, that it is such a stupendous piece of constructive work, that we can not afford now, with the history of this legislation fresh in our minds, as it has been reviewed by the Senator from Alabama, to jeopardize the appropriation. The two Houses have come so near to the point, the difference between them being comparatively small, that I think we have everything to gain and nothing to lose by concurring in the House amendment whereby identically the same work which we provided should begin on the 1st day of July will begin on the 1st day of October.

Mr. POMERENE. But, Mr. President, there are a number of days between this time and July 1; and if we were to recommit this bill because of our objection to this particular amendment, it does seem to me that we ought to know in another 24 hours whether or not the House will yield. My belief is that they would not insist upon this amendment if they knew the attitude of the Senate. I do not know. That is merely a guess. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let me state to the Senator from Ohio, knowing the situation as I do, that I can not conceive how there is likely to be any great loss to the Government except the danger of the destruction of certain work that is there. You must remember that that work has been standing there for two or three years. Certainly 90 days can not make any very great difference as to that, except the loss of time involved in not putting in the dam or the foundations of the dam during the summer months. There will be no great amount of risk incurred between now and the 1st of October. As every Senator knows, the month of October is more or less as open as the months of July, August, and September, and if there is any danger that this structure may be jeopardized by floods or decay during those 90 days they might put it in such condition as to prepare against any such danger; so that the difference between the House and the Senate, so far as any loss to the Government is concerned, is almost negligible. The completion of the work will be delayed to some extent, but the risk that we run of losing the entire project is so infinitely greater than any incidental loss that may be incurred by waiting the 90 days that I, for one, am not going to take a chance on it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Will not the same matter that is now being thrashed out on the floor of the Senate come up on the question of appointing conferees?

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about that; but the action of the House is ominous.

Mr. HARRELD. Is it not likely that when the House takes up the question of appointing conferees it will not appoint them, but will simply concur in the action of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH. But the possibility is that the House, in the urgency that is on us right now, may reject the entire amendment. We had that very experience with practically this same amendment on another bill. The whole argument, in a word, is this: Shall we jeopardize the whole project, with the danger of losing out on the entire thing, by refusing to accept the House amendment, or shall we accept the House amendment and insure the completion of the project?

That is what Senators must decide upon: Shall we accept the House amendment and insure this appropriation and the completion of the project, or shall we reject the House amendment and jeopardize the entire thing?

Ninety days is the only difference between us and the House. The reasons that the House had are set forth in the debate. I sincerely hope that we will complete a project fraught with so much of good for the Government and for the agricultural interests of this country, because I firmly believe that the House and the Senate are going to see to it that this great power shall be developed in the interest of the protection of the Government in time of war and for the benefit of agriculture in time of peace. I drafted the original bill upon which this whole project is predicated, and the statute now provides that during times of peace this power shall be used for agricultural purposes and that during times of war it shall be used for the production of the basis of our explosives; and I sincerely hope that the Senate will accept this House provision.

I want to say, because I do not care to be misunderstood about it, that I know that the Senator from Nebraska and the Agricultural Committee, in reporting out the $7,500,000 to be immediately available, did it because we thought that work ought to be carried on to completion, and we ought to begin now. I do not agree with the House as to postponing it. I do not believe that the Government's program of expending $7,500,000 will affect in the slightest degree any contract that the Government may make with anybody, because in any event the Government has to bear that expense no matter who gets the contract, and it is simply a question of whether or not we are going to commit ourselves to the completion of this project.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. It seems to me that we have all come to the same conclusion about the action of the House. I do not think anybody has any doubt that it was a mistake. If it had not been for the Agricultural Committee of the Senate, there would have been no appropriation at all for this purpose put on here. The House had had their opportunity, and they did not do so. I think they have listened to some people who were more anxious to show that they can do something than they are to be really helpful, and I think it was a very serious mistake.

Mr. SMITH. I think, Mr. President, that it was a very unreasonable proposition on the part of the House; but we have it. Now, the question is, As sensible men, what shall we do? Shall we jeopardize the entire project, or, by agreeing to the House amendment, shall we guarantee the completion of the entire project? That is the proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, there is no denying the fact that there is a great deal in the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the months of July, August, and September ought to be utilized in work on the dam at Muscle Shoals. I recall that all of the friends of the Muscle Shoals project expressed the desire to see the appropriation of $7,500,000 provided as soon as possible so that the work could begin at an early date. I supported the proposition to complete that dam under the leadership of my colleague in this body two years ago when we secured the appropriation necessary. We passed it through this body twice, and it was defeated in the House both times. Now we have secured in the Senate another appropriation of $7,500,000, the amount the Government engineers say is necessary to carry on this work for one year at Muscle Shoals. But, Mr. President, the House in its consideration of this provision decided to extend for three months the time when this seven and a half million dollars would be available. The House simply fixes the time when the appropriation can be had on October 1 instead of July 1, and practically all of the Members of Congress from the South, where the Muscle Shoals dam is located, voted for that change in the time. Like my colleague, I can not see that the making of this money available July 1 would in any way injuriously affect the offer of Mr. Ford. That was understood when the amendment was first agreed upon. The question was asked: "Will this affect, one way or the other, the Henry Ford offer?" The reply was: "It will not." The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was one of the Senators who asked that question.

Mr. President, I suggested in the early spring that a committee go down and visit Muscle Shoals and we went. A committee from the House joined us, and every Senator and Member of the House who visited Muscle Shoals, when he saw that great dam, the work that had been done, and that needed to be done, said: "Yes; it ought to be completed as soon as possible." They all expressed a willingness to aid in securing the necessary appropriation for that purpose.

We had favored an appropriation to complete it before and when we came back from Muscle Shoals we provided for the appropriation in the Senate.

Now, it is urged in the House by the friends of the persons who are bidding for Muscle Shoals that they ought to know what disposition is going to be made of those bids, and they claim that they have not had time to settle that question up to this date, and they are asking for a little more time that they may have until the 1st of October so that definite action can be had on the Ford offer, so that he and all parties interested in the Muscle Shoals project will know just exactly what disposition is to be made of it.

There is force in that argument. Mr. Ford and the other people bidding are entitled to know whether or not they are going to get this plant, and it seems to me that a request for three months' time is not unreasonable. Now, they are asking that the matter may be held up while they are marking time in the House in order to give them time sufficient to get action on the Ford offer and all the offers made. This will give them time to push the Ford offer to the front and decide so far as the House is concerned.

What is to be done with Muscle Shoals? I am heartily for the Ford offer, Mr. President. I agree with some of the things that have been said by my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. If we fail to concur in the House amendment there is danger of losing this entire appropriation; and I think that in order to remove all doubt and make sure that we will get this money for work on the dam three months from now we ought to concur in the House amendment, and I hope, Mr. President, that that will be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say a few more words in answer to some of the arguments that have been made.

First, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], both of whom concede that the position I have taken is the logical one and the right one, do not agree with me that it is a practical one. They say they are afraid we will lose the whole thing. The men who have put this amendment on in the House pretend to be the men who favor more than anybody else the development of Muscle Shoals. Do you doubt it? Do you think they are deceiving the country and the House when they advocate the development of Muscle Shoals? Maybe there are some of them that are deceiving the country and the House, but I do not know any of them that are making the argument but that I believe are in earnest about it. They want Muscle Shoals developed. They want this great dam completed. Are they going to throw it in the scrap heap? Are the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from New York afraid that Muscle Shoals is going to be killed in the House by its friends? Are we going to back up now, when we say we are right, because we are afraid the other fellows in the other House will scrap this proposition?

There is no danger of that unless you make the charge that the men in the House from Alabama and Michigan—they are the ones who led the fight over there—are not sincere. I do not suppose you mean that. Nobody has charged it, and I do not think anybody believes it. They want Muscle Shoals developed just as badly as we do; and if, by doing what is right in the Senate, we are going to give the opportunity to the friends of Muscle Shoals in the House likewise to do what is right, then, for God's sake, let us do it and not get scared.

The Senator from New York says this bill may be held up. Of course, everybody has to admit that possibility. That has often happened before since I have been in the Senate and while I was in the House. We did that pretty nearly every year for several years last passed, and passed joint resolutions extending the old appropriations to carry them on for a week or 10 days or such a matter until an agreement on a conference report was made, and the country still lived. The same thing happened with the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It happened with nearly all the appropriation bills a couple of years ago, and in 15 minutes' time, when it was known that we were not going to agree on an appropriation bill by the first of the fiscal year, we had a joint resolution passed extending the existing appropriations until the new bill went into effect.

Senators, that ought not to scare anybody; and I myself can not quite appreciate how Senators, one after another, will get up here and say: "Yes; the Senate is right; your amendment ought to be agreed to; we ought not to delay this until the 1st of October, but I am going to vote to delay it just the same because I am afraid we will lose the thing in a conference between the two Houses."

As I said before, I would rather lose it than to have what the House gives us; but there is no danger of losing it. If the representatives from Alabama, where this development is proposed, and the representatives from Michigan, where Mr. Ford lives, who have put this burden upon the taxpayers by their combination, are sincere and want Muscle Shoals developed more than they want to add two or three hundred million dollars to the property of one man, then it will not fail and there will not be any danger of it failing.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Nebraska to test out some of these controverted questions with the House, and I have been urging that action all session; but, as a matter of fact, the Senate has been defeated by the House in every conference that has come up, to my knowledge, and we have only about two days in which to get defeated on this question. If I were not perfectly confident that the attitude of the Senate has been such that the House knows that they will defeat us—and the vote on the amendment over there shows that they intend to defeat us—I would vote for the motion of the Senator from Nebraska; but I will not vote for an absolutely positive defeat when I am convinced that that is what will happen.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is the 27th day of the month. I have never seen Senators so afraid of an appropriation bill not passing when the 1st of July was just ahead of us. Almost every session of Congress I have seen appropriation bills going to conference to the very last minute, and when they were not agreed to we passed a concurrent resolution. Why are we scared now? The Senator from Nevada and every other Senator agrees that we are right, but they say we have been surrendering to the House, the House has been beating us upon appropriation bills, and therefore they are in favor of surrendering in advance on this one. That is the attitude of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am convinced, from the attitude of the Senate on all their conferences, that we will get licked if we send it back, and so is the House convinced.

Mr. NORRIS. It is worth something to postpone our licking for a few days rather than to take it to-day.

Mr. PITTMAN. We know when we send a coward into a fight that he is going to get licked.

Mr. NORRIS. We will not get licked unless a majority of the Senate stand up, as Senators have been doing to-day, and say, "This is right, but I am going to vote on the wrong side because the House asked me to, and I am afraid they will win out." When our debates are read in the House, it will not have very much of a tendency to cause the House conferees to yield when they find Senators saying, "Of course, the House is wrong, and this is a terrible mistake; but the House is going to have its way, and we may as well give it to them first as last."

Why do we ever adopt an amendment to an appropriation bill? If that argument is good, why waste the time of the Senate by amending appropriation bills which come from the House? Why not say, "The House is going to have it, anyway. Send it back by a formal passage, without any amendment or suggested amendment."

Mr. President, it is not a question of who is going to yield; it is a question of who is right. That is conceded. For the first time in my experience in Congress I have found a question under discussion as to which everybody was agreed that one side was right and yet on which they were going to vote wrong. I point them to the famous American, who once said to a great foreign government, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute."

I am not afraid of sending the Muscle Shoals proposition back to the conference with the statement from the Senator that we will not agree to that amendment. They can take it or let it go out of the bill. They will take it. They want Muscle Shoals, just as we do. They know, just as we do, that we are right.

Mr. President, what is the proposition? They say, "You can have the money to build Muscle Shoals, and we want you to have it. We want to build it; but we want to fix the appropriation in such a way that you can not work at it when the sun shines."

It is like renting a piece of land to a man and putting in the contract that the tenant shall not be allowed to plow any of the land unless it is frozen up. It is like letting a contract to a man to build a house and saying, "You can work on this house only during the rain. When the sun shines you must let it rot." It is the most foolish proposition, it seems to me, ever made, and when I listen to one Senator after another agreeing that the proposition is wrong, that it is going to cost the taxpayers of the United States several million dollars extra, I can not conceive how they can say that they are going to vote to carry out that proposition.

Mr. President, when I had the floor a half an hour or an hour ago I spoke about the propaganda of Mr. Silver. Since I have spoken I have heard from several other Senators in regard to the proposition, and a Senator has handed me a telegram. I will not read the name, but I will read the telegram. It says:

> We are depending on you to see House amendment to Muscle Shoals appropriation is accepted by the Senate.

There is your command, Mr. Senator. There are your orders; take them. There is the captain; there is the fellow who controls the vote. You are depended on to see that this amendment is agreed to by the Senate. There is your boss. It is not the House of Representatives. Take your command from him.

Who is this great general, Gray Silver? A man, Mr. President, who has been on the witness stand, a man who knows what the Muscle Shoals proposition is, a man who a year ago was standing for the Government operation of Muscle Shoals, who now says that the Government retention of that property down there at Muscle Shoals would be the greatest sin of the age, who is sending his cohorts over the United States, into the States of Senators who are members of the Committee on Agriculture, getting people to write them to demand, without any explanation, that they vote for anything that Mr. Ford's fellows want.

I said in the beginning of my remarks that there is no objection to the man who wants to support Mr. Ford; but we made an agreement with Mr. Ford's own men, and it was understood that we would unite on this one proposition. But when they get it through the Senate and get it into the House, then they put on this kind of an amendment.

Mr. Silver knows better than to make the argument he is making. He knows that he is not representing the farmers of America. I do not mean to criticize him for favoring Mr. Ford. He had a perfect right to do that. But he has not told the truth. I have on my desk now a letter that was sent to all the farm organizations, filled with misrepresentations. Nowhere in it is the real truth told to the farmers, in order that they may understand what the proposition is. Now, he says, "We are looking to you." How many Senators have those telegrams in their pockets now, saying, "We are looking to you to see that the House of Representatives amendment is put into the appropriation bill"?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Can the Senator from Nebraska understand why it is that the Government should spend an enormous amount of money in developing the water power at Muscle Shoals, and then turn it over to the private exploitation of anybody?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I can not. Let me call attention to the position you are putting those in who have been behind Muscle Shoals, who have represented the Senate of the United States in good faith on this proposition. I speak now of the friends of Mr. Ford, the same as of those who are not favorable to Mr. Ford. I want to call Senators' attention to where they are placing us.

For weeks and weeks we have listened patiently to testimony. We have been analyzing the evidence. We have been reading documents by the volume, and by the unanimous consensus of opinion we agree that while Congress may not at once decide what the permanent policy shall be, we want to save that Government property, and complete that Dam No. 2. We can only save the Government's property and the taxpayers' money by immediate work on it; so we agreed on this amendment, which went through the Senate.

What was said in the House debate? One of the Representatives said in that debate, among other things:

The Senate amendment is merely a piece of hypocrisy.

The Committee on Agriculture, composed of Democrats and Republicans, composed of men some of whom wanted Ford to have Muscle Shoals, some of whom were opposed to Ford, and some who were in favor of Government retention of Muscle Shoals, with all those differences of opinion, united on this amendment, reporting it in good faith, and induced the Senate to pass it, and now we are charged by those who have put this amendment on with being hypocrites. Are you going to cast a vote to-day that would say they are right when they charged us with being hypocrites? If your servants faithfully carry out what they believe to be right, and receive your approval, and then are charged with being hypocrites, and their amendment is being referred to as a piece of hypocrisy, how are you going to vote to-day?

Mr. KENDRICK. Did the chairman on that trip to Muscle Shoals, conferring, no doubt, with members of the committee of the House and members of the committee of the Senate, talk with any member of either committee who was not in accord with the plan to go ahead and begin immediate construction on Dam No. 2?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear anybody oppose it. They all agreed that the only economical and proper thing to do was to go ahead.

Mr. KENDRICK. Was not that about the only question, of the tremendously involved problems at Muscle Shoals, upon which there was general agreement?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that was the thing as to which there was unanimous agreement.

Mr. KENDRICK. To secure an appropriation as early as possible and to begin this construction at the earliest possible date?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not very pertinent to the inquiry, but the Senator has just read a statement which he says was made in the House, which I did not see, some Member of the House saying that the Senate appropriation of this $7,500,000 to complete the dam at Muscle Shoals was hypocrisy. I do not ask the name of the gentleman who made that statement, because that may not be in order, but I would like to know if that gentleman voted for the Senate amendment with this amendment added to it?

Mr. NORRIS. He did.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the gentleman who expressed those opinions evidently thought it was hypocrisy to propose to build this dam in July, but not hypocrisy to propose to build it in October.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the logical conclusion. I did not read this statement at first, until I heard all the Senators saying that they thought I was right, but that they were going to vote against me. I had read it before, but I did not pay much attention to it, because the man who made the statement is a Member of the House for whom I have always maintained the warmest kind of friendship, and I have great admiration for him. He is a very courageous man, and I was surprised at his statement. In my judgment, in this particular case, he is not exhibiting his usual courage. I hardly know how I felt when I read the statement made by that man in regard to something which I as much as any other one man was the author of. I could hardly see how he could have said that, but it is there in the RECORD, just as I have read it. I think in a great sense the rejection of this amendment would be a vote of censure by the Senate of the United States of its Committee on Agriculture.

The Ford fellows do not care so much about that because the Government pays the money anyway. They think it comes out of the taxpayers. The Members of the House who are making the fight admitted they were for Mr. Ford and they were making the fight, they thought, in his interest. I think they are entirely mistaken. I would not, if I had an opportunity, take any advantage of Mr. Ford in his offer because he has made it in good faith, and while I do not agree with him at all, it is entitled to respectful consideration.

Let me say a word in conclusion. I am reminded of it because I see the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is honoring me with his presence and also with his attention. I said the other day in a little colloquy with the Senator from Alabama that I would join with him and try to take up the question of a settlement of the Ford proposition. I told him frankly that I did not believe it could be settled at this session of Congress, but if there was a possibility of doing it I could be counted as one who would try to have it done. I said that I would vote to take it up even if it displaced the tariff bill, that I would unite with him any time where there was any reason to expect that we could get the bill up. Now, I want to modify what I said, and I think I am justified in doing it in view of the action taken by the House, in which it was plainly stated that those who took it did so because they wanted to force Congress to accept Mr. Ford's offer.

I have always stated that those who were in favor of Mr. Ford's offer were conscientious and honest and had a perfect right to advocate it, and while I did not know what the outcome was going to be I was willing to unite with them to get an expeditious result. We had in a friendly way worked together as far as we could and agreed to disagree when we could not agree longer. We agreed on the Senate amendment. We were all acting, I take it, in good faith and we put it through. The charge is now made that we are not acting in an honorable way, that we are practicing deception, and I think all agreements for working in harmony have probably been broken on that account. If the people who want Mr. Ford to have Muscle Shoals can see nothing but dishonor and hypocrisy in those who believe the Governmnt ought to retain the property and, after making, as nearly as gentlemen can, an agreement, if they feel disposed not to keep it any longer, the agreement is off. If Mr. Ford's representatives in Congress or out of Congress are going to take that position, I want to say to them now, while I speak only for myself, that my efforts to obtain harmony and to obtain an agreement for the fair consideration of all the questions involved are at an end. They can resort to their methods if they want to, and while I am not going to resort to anything that I think is wrong or bad, and may do nothing, I do not know; at least I have no agreement that extends beyond the present time. They can take what they get. I will take what I get. They can fight in any way they want to. I will do the same thing. If the Senate feels that we ought to agree to the House amendment at the expense of the taxpayers of America, who in the end will pay all the bill, and it may be many millions of dollars, let the Senate take the responsibility.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall delay the Senate but a moment. The passage that has been quoted from the House debates reflecting upon the motives of the Senate in adopting the amendment to the appropriation bill is, of course, wholly out of order. The Senate is entirely entitled, if it sees fit, to send a message to the House calling attention to the character of that statement. I do not suppose the Senate will do anything about it, because the Senate has fallen in the way of late years of yielding to the House in every contested matter of importance. This I have seen with a great deal of regret, because I think the Senate is entitled under the Constitution to fair consideration in matters in difference between the two Houses.

Now, the same thing that I have seen so much in late years is presented to us again to-day. The amendment by the House of the Senate amendment is indefensible. I have been listening all morning to the debate. I have heard no one defend it on its merits. The sole argument is that the House will not accept the Senate amendment; that if we disagree we are in danger of losing the bill. Why is it any worse for us to lose the bill than for the House to lose the bill? It is no worse for us than it is for them. I have seen many bills go back to conference within four days of the end of a fiscal year. I have seen a great many in the last few years, especially during the war, forced by business to go over the 1st of July and the Government has continued and still continues. It is not going to wreck the Army; it is not going to hurt the Government.

It seems to me that this is a very important matter. The amendment of the House as it stands is economically wrong. It is not right or fair to the taxpayers, and it ought not to be accepted by the Senate. Are we to be told we can not disagree with it once and send it back to conference for fear the House will not like it and will give us something else, assuming that we shall yield, of course, always in the end? Mr. President, I can not vote that way. I shall vote with the Senator from Nebraska for a further conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for a roll call on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is great confusion in the minds of some Senators, at least, as to what the motion is. May we have it stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska is that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate relative to Muscle Shoals and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. NORRIS's motion to disagree to the House amendment and request a conference was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from New York to concur in the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 225.

The motion was agreed to.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3458) to authorize the Niagara River Bridge Co. to reconstruct its present bridge across the Niagara River between the State of New York and the Dominion of Canada, or to remove its present bridge and construct, maintain, and operate a new bridge across the said river, which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "heretofore, under lawful authority then existing"; on page 1, line 6, to strike out all after "Canada," down to and including "States," in line 8; on page 2, to strike out lines 9 to 18, inclusive; and page 2, line 19, to strike out "3" and insert "2."

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I ought to ask that that go over. I desire to look into it. For the present, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska objects.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the pending amendment of the Committee on Finance to the tariff bill.

RETRENCHMENT OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on yesterday there appeared in the press of the country a statement issued by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee. This statement was carried on the first page of the Washington Post and was headed:

Says Harding plans saved $7,000,000,000 for Nation.

Naturally it attracts the attention of the country when a statement is placed at the masthead of a reputable newspaper with a large circulation that "Harding plans have saved $7,000,000,000." I suppose that when the people read that statement, not only in this particular newspaper but in other newspapers—and it will, perhaps, be carried in some of the magazines—they wondered why we are proposing to pass a tariff bill; they wondered why it is necessary to lay any additional taxes upon the people when the present administration has saved $7,000,000,000 in so short a time. May I ask what has become of this alleged huge saving?

I should not at this time, Mr. President, occupy the floor of the Senate in the discussion of this remarkable statement if it were not for the source from which the statement comes. Such a statement, coming from a Senator with the reputation and standing and mighty influence of the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, naturally would carry much weight, but when it comes from him as the chairman of the senatorial Republican campaign committee it is given added emphasis, and naturally will be read by more people and will be quoted by Republican leaders everywhere as the outstanding achievement of this administration.

I read the statement in one respect with a great deal of pleasure, for I am glad to see the Senator from Illinois again come to life politically. The other day when Mr. Adams, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, called together the "purse holders" in order to obtain large contributions for the purpose of running the campaign and to formulate plans for the coming election he ignored the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Illinois stated that he was not invited to attend that conference. In that confab it was resolved to have very little to do with the Republican senatorial committee, and the newspapers stated that the Senator from Illinois had been demoted. He had been relegated to an insignificant place in the rear of the selected few. So I am glad to see him reexert his authority and employ the power of his high position to which his colleagues have elevated him, namely, chairman of the senatorial Republican campaign committee, and give out some kind of a statement, whether it misrepresents the facts or not. However, thinking people everywhere know that it is an impossibility for the present administration to have saved $7,000,000,000. I do not know where the Senator from Illinois got his information. It is because it may fool an unsuspecting few that I am now discussing it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator from Mississippi quote me as having said that the present administration has saved $7,000,000,000?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh yes; but I am going to get to that in a moment.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; I think the Senator can not quote me as saying that.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, we will see in a moment what the Senator said. This interview states:

Contrasting the estimates and appropriations for the fiscal years of 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923, Senator McCORMICK said a Republican Congress——

Mr. McCORMICK. "A Republican Congress."

Mr. HARRISON. Yes—

had saved the people $7,000,000,000.

I arose to combat that proposition, and when I have finished, if the Senator will listen to me, he will acknowledge his mistake. He will admit that those who prepared the alleged facts for him were wrong; that his figures do not represent any saving from the estimates presented by the Democratic administration; but the newspapers carry his statement with the headline:

Says Harding plans saved $7,000,000,000 for Nation.

The Senator certainly would not impugn the motives of the editor of the Washington Post. I can not believe that he means that Mr. McLean, the head of the great Washington newspaper, would take the facts as given in the Senator's statement and misrepresent those facts to the patrons of the Washington Post by any such headline as that. The Senator says there is nothing in his statement that could be construed to mean that he had said that the Harding administration had saved $7,000,000,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Now let——

Mr. HARRISON. And yet the Washington Post on the front page, in large type, says, in speaking of the Senator's statement:

Says Harding plans saved $7,000,000,000 for Nation.

If the Senator will just bide his time in patience, I am going to dissect this statement of his not only in that particular but in other particulars. I am going to demonstrate to him that his so-called facts are all wrong, and that he ought to make an apology not only to his colleagues here but to the country as well.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator let me read my statement?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator may do so when I have finished. I am going to read it for him.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; the Senator is going to read what he has before him.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I am going to read what was published in the Washington Post, which is Republican authority enough. If the Senator can bide his time he can put in the full statement after I shall have closed my brief remarks.

Mr. McCORMICK. I thank the Senator for his complacency.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is always kind and is always appreciative.

The Senator from Illinois is quoted further as follows:

He characterized America as an oasis of prosperity in the world.

We shall not take issue with the Senator on that. There is not so much prosperity in the country now as there was when the Democratic administration handed over the reins of the Government to the Senator's party, but there is still some prosperity, especially among the monopolies and trusts, to benefit and to foster which the Senator is always voting for legislation. There is every reason why there should be prosperity in America. The foot of no foreign foe during the World War ever touched the soil of America. It was during the war that, under the magnificent and efficient forces of a Democratic administration, the industrial agencies of the country were organized; they were greased, they were oiled, they were enlarged so that they might take care of the great opportunities that would come to America following the war. Things happened in America that did not happen in England, in France, or in Germany. Those countries had war right at their own doors, but over here we were busy making our factories larger or building new ones so that we could accept the opportunities presented to America following the war, when war-torn and devastated nations would need more of our lumber and more of our iron and more or our steel and everything that had been destroyed or hampered during the war in order to set the wheels of industry in those countries moving. So I congratulate the Senator upon his allusion to America as still being an oasis of prosperity, even though if it had continued in force the Underwood tariff law, that really gave the country for eight years a prosperity unrivaled and unequaled in all the previous history of the country we would to-day be assured of more prosperity. Why, sirs, our prosperity and industrial stability to-day is due, too, in large part to the beneficent Federal reserve system, that has given us the strongest and most secure credit system in all the world. That, sirs, was a Democratic accomplishment.

But the Senator says:

The unemployment in England is something like six times per capita the unemployment of the United States.

The unemployment in Great Britain on September 30, 1921, the latest available figures, was 1,485,000, as compared with the lowest estimate of unemployment in the United States, 5,000,000.

I do not know where the Senator got his figures from, but if they have six times more unemployment in England now in proportion to the population than we have in America, then there is certainly some unemployment over there.

Mr. McCORMICK. There certainly is.

Mr. HARRISON. Why, in the report a few months ago of the Secretary of Labor of the Senator's own party, he said there were upward of 5,000,000 men and women out of employment in this country, and the Senator and others criticized the Secretary of Labor and his report; fault was found with it and every kind of influence was brought to bear upon him to change it in some way, so that the indictment that their own Secretary of Labor had made against this administration touching unemployment might be modified to some extent.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator does not mean that I criticized the Secretary of Labor for making that statement?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, not openly, perhaps, but secretly, yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am glad to see the Senator smile when he says that.

Mr. HARRISON. I was only smiling at the benign countenance of my good friend. I can not look at him without smiling.

He says:

The unemployment in Scandinavia is increasing at a time when our Department of Labor reports that 2,000,000 idle men in America have gone to work in the last 90 days.

I should like to see the figures of the men who have gone to work in the last 90 days; and why did the Senator pick out little Scandinavia? Why did he not take the Canary Islands or Siam or Iceland to compare the growing unemployment of the United States instead of Scandinavia?

He says:

Last year, in terms of dollars, the exports of England and France amounted to a fraction more than they did during the last year preceding the war. German exports, computed in dollars, amounted to one-third of their value during the last year before the war, while American exports were nearly 75 per cent greater than they were in 1914.

The exports from this country last year, says the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, were 75 per cent greater than in the year 1914; and in 1914, under the Democratic administration, exports from the United States were higher than at any time in the previous history of the Government. Was there any change in the tariff laws for last year, under which we were exporting goods from America, from the year 1914? We were still operating last year under the Underwood-Simmons law, the wisest and best tariff measure ever placed upon the statute books; and the Senator himself admits that under that law the exports from America last year were 75 per cent more than they were in 1914, when they were higher than ever before in the history of the Government; and he clinches his proposition by saying that while Germany's exports were only about one-third of what they were in 1914, and those of France and England were just a trifle more, American exports were 75 per cent more than they were in 1914.

If that be true, then why the necessity of enacting a tariff law such as you propose here, that will erect tariff walls of protection that will cause other countries to retaliate and compel these exports to drop off to what they were in the bad old panicky Republican days?

But the Senator goes further:

The work of the present Congress, Senator McCORMICK said, is not fairly understood by the American people.

As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] suggests, there would be a mob here if they did. Yes, and you will think it a very cruel mob when election day in November rolls around, and the first opportunity comes to the American people to condemn what you say "the American people do not understand." You have enough papers in the country to make them understand. You are working your presses night and day. You have your paid agents around, and your publicity bureau constantly at work. You certainly have carried on enough propaganda of misrepresentation to make them believe that you have done something, and yet the chairman of the senatorial Republican campaign committee says that "the American people do not understand the record of the Republican Party in the Congress!"

And they should realize—

He says—

what steps have been taken by the present administration "to make good the waste of war and the profligate management of the Democratic administration during its anarchic last two years."

Mr. President, mistakes may have been made in the management of the war. Naturally, mistakes were expected; but, sirs, if mistakes were made, they were made by Republicans as well as by Democrats. I am thankful that during the war no partisanship was known; that in the War Department there were three Assistant Secretaries of War allied with the Republican Party; that in the food administration, in the railroad administration, in the Navy Department, and in every other department and bureau of the Government, Republicans were accepted because of their efficiency and qualifications, and partisanship was not allowed to show its head. Mistakes may have been made, but, sirs, what was done hastened the culmination of the war. It brought peace to a dissipated, war-torn, and crying world. "Profligate waste!" What would the Senator's party have done if had been in control? Would it have withheld the appropriations that the departments asked for? Would it have withheld sustenance from the Army and the Navy and the marines? Would it have refused to appropriate money for ordnance and for arms and for ships and cruisers and submarines? If it would have done that, the war would have been prolonged for months, yea, perhaps years; but those who led the party during the war believed that it was best to pour out the money in order to provide the agencies and implements and weapons necessary to bring peace to the world. The American people, without respect to class, section, or party, indorsed that view, and had no patience with those who combated it. So if we made some mistakes, if there was some waste expended at the time, we did it in the interest of hastening peace and bringing victory and glory to our cause.

The Senator says further:

Contrasting the estimates and appropriations for the fiscal years of 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923, Senator McCORMICK said a Republican Congress had saved the people $7,000,000,000.

Seven billions of dollars! The Senator says now he did not say it. Why did a Republican paper, such as the Washington Post, place it in big letters and say that the Senator said it?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator, when he first alluded to my statement, as he will see if he will turn to the stenographic report, quoted me as having said that the administration had saved such a sum.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, Harding is about the only thing in the administration.

Mr. CARAWAY. Daugherty is in it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; Daugherty and Harding.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not think the Senator from Mississippi, even in debate, will want to misquote me.

Mr. HARRISON. I will admit that the Senator from Illinois is a part of the administration. I apologize to him.

Mr. President, this remarkable statement that goes abroad, read by people everywhere, says that—

Contrasting the estimates and appropriations for the fiscal years of 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923, Senator McCORMICK said a Republican Congress had saved the people $7,000,000,000.

I am wondering, now, if the Senator believes that statement. I am wondering if the Senator still adheres to that language.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have it from the Budget Bureau.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the Senator says he has it from the Budget Bureau, which the Senator designates in his statement the "good McCormick Budget system"; and now he goes back and lays the responsibility for this statement upon poor Dawes, who is about to lay down the reins of that great office as Budget Director, and give them over to General Lord. So that is the authority that the Senator has for saying that the Congress saved the people $7,000,000,000 from the estimates of the years 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923. Why, bless your soul, the Budget system was not in existence at that time. It has only been created in the last year, and yet the Senator says that the Budget system gave him these figures.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Book of Estimates was submitted to Congress annually prior to the creation of the Budget system.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator read the Book of Estimates?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Book of Estimates was before the Director of the Budget Bureau and his subordinates when they prepared the statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but the Senator did not read the estimates. I knew that he did not. I knew that if the Senator had read the Book of Estimates he would not have made that statement. He says "that in the years 1920, 1921, 1922, and 1923, $7,000,000,000 was saved by the Congress over the estimates." Why, here is what he counted. Here is what he did. I want the country to know the hypocrisy that is practiced here, the kind of misrepresentation that goes into the press touching the achievements of this Congress and this administration.

On November 11, 1918, the war closed. The estimates for the fiscal year 1920 were made in the summer of 1918, before the war closed. Those estimates were based on the continuation of the war another year; and so when the war closed, on November 11, 1918, immediately the heads of the departments filed a supplemental estimate, and they reduced their original estimates between three and four billion dollars for that year; and yet the Senator sends word broadcast to the country that Harding's administration or the Congress has reduced the estimates $7,000,000,000! It is a great achievement, is it not, that because the war closed November 11, 1918, and because the estimates were made in August, 1918, and because in December, 1918, they were reduced three or four billion dollars at the instance of a Democratic administration, you say that $7,000,000,000 was saved by the Congress from the estimates! Why, sirs, the Democratic Party did not lose control of the Congress until March 4, 1919, and the executive departments March 4, 1921.

Mr. McCORMICK. What has the Senator to say for the estimates and appropriations for the two ensuing years?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the Senator is trying to get away from something now.

Mr. McCORMICK. No.

Mr. HARRISON. And I take it that that is an admission. He is trying to draw me along another line of argument, away from the issue that I have presented here, because of the statement that he has published broadcast around the country of a saving of $7,000,000,000 by the Congress over the estimates. No; I shall not leave the subject yet. I want to discuss it further. I want to show the fallacy of the statement. I want to demonstrate even to the Senator its ridiculousness—its utter impossibility.

When I have concluded I hope that the Senator—because I have great respect for his fairness—will rise and say, "I made a mistake, because the Budget Bureau advised me incorrectly and wrongly about the proposition." I hope he will say further, "I would not have given this statement out if I had looked at the estimate and considered it for myself."

The estimate for the Army bill in 1918 was revised by the War Department voluntarily from $1,916,000,000 to $1,185,000,000. Immediately following the war the War Department cut its estimate for that one year by $731,000,000. Yet the Senator takes the higher figure, which obtained before the war closed, and claims the reduction as a Republican achievement.

The fact of the matter is that at that time there was not a Republican President in the White House, and the Republicans did not control either branch of Congress. We were in complete control of all the branches of the Government, and voluntarily the Army estimates were reduced $731,000,000. Yet the Senator, accepting the suggestion of the Budget Bureau, took the larger figure, $1,916,000,000.

That is not all. I have the House report here. I want the Senator to rise and speak now if there is the slightest doubt about the statement I have just made. The Senator sits silent. I take his silence as an admission that his figures on that one item for that one year were some $730,000,000 too much.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator need not accept my silence as an admission of anything.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator always speaks when he has something to say, and he knows how to keep his tongue when it would be unwise to speak.

Mr. McCORMICK. That is not always true of the Senator's colleagues.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that is not true of some of his colleagues on the other side. They talk when they should not talk. Of course the Senator was not alluding to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, let us take the Navy Department appropriation bill that year. In the Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, when we controlled things, the Secretary of the Navy, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, voluntarily reduced the naval estimate from $2,644,000,000 to $976,000,000. They reduced it $1,668,000,000, and they did it voluntarily. Yet the Senator claims that that was an achievement of the Republican administration. They were not then in control of the House or the Senate or any branch of the Government. No wonder the people have lost faith in you. It is not surprising that they have no confidence in you, when statements like that are made as claims of achievements, when the cold facts show exactly the contrary.

That is not all. Let us take the appropriations for fortifications in that Congress. The fortification estimates at the same session were revised by the War Department, in hearings before the House Committee on Appropriations, from $574,000,000 to $93,000,000, or a reduction of $481,000,000. Yet the Senator claims all that as a Republican achievement, and the Washington Post carries it in great headlines as a Harding saving of $7,000,000,000.

That is not all. I could take the record of the Congress and show, even to the satisfaction of the Senator, that the large reductions for the Navy and Army and other appropriations were forced on your unwilling majority by the Democratic minority, aided by a few Senators over there. It has been very difficult, with all of our efforts, to force any retrenchments upon you. The statement further says:

Since Warren Harding took office—

Said Mr. McCORMICK—

we have paid off nearly a billion dollars of the national debt.

I will tell you how you paid it off. I have the facts from the Treasury Department. You paid it off by salvaging funds and selling surplus goods which we had purchased to win the war. You did not save it; you salvaged it. You sold all those accumulated goods and wares, which were purchased as necessary to win the war, and that money went into the Treasury of the United States, and it went to pay off some of the indebtedness of a billion dollars. Yet you claim that in this statement as a great Republican achievement.

I have here the report of the comptroller of February 28, 1921, and August 31, 1919. The bonded indebtedness of the United States on August 31, 1919, while Wilson was President of the United States, was $26,594,000,000. Just before he went out, about six days before his administration ended, on February 28, 1921, the debt was $24,000,000,000. It showed a decrease of two billion and a half dollars from the time of the armistice, or near that, to the time the Wilson administration went out of office.

Why did you not give the Democratic administration credit for reducing the indebtedness two and a half times as much as you did at practically the same time that you claim a billion-dollar reduction?

Let us go a little further in this remarkable statement:

Under the McCormick Budget Act—

"Good McCormick Budget Act." I have just transposed a little bit.

Under the "good McCormick" Budget Act we have cut the annual expenditures of the Federal Government $1,000,000,000, or about 25 per cent a year.

I suppose he got those figures from the Budget, too. The Senator has seen, and I have seen, more deficiency bills come to the Senate from the House during this administration than ever before, and they were in larger amounts. One was reported here last week to appropriate a lot of money for deficiencies which the Budget did not provide for. So they go ahead and take the figures of the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget and make the appropriations in the regular supply bills and say, "That is a saving by virtue of the Budget." Then you bring along one, two, three, four deficiency bills, appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars, which they do not count in the expenditures at all.

Let me give the Senator one specific instance: Some time ago, in 1908, the Congress appropriated $7,500 for the widow of a dead Representative or Senator. A lot of you are politically dead and do not know it. This one was actually dead, and $7,500 was appropriated. The widow would not take it; first, because she did not want it; and secondly, after a while she died. So the money has been carried year after year for about 10 or 12 years. Mr. Dawes said, "Let us wipe that off," and it was wiped off, and they claim that as a saving to the Government by virtue of the Budget system.

Mr. President, I hope the Budget system will come to something, but let me remind the Senator that while his name was attached to the bill which created the Budget he will recall that President Wilson, in no less than three messages to Congress, asked the Congress to establish the Budget system, and the Congress passed a bill creating the Budget, it went to him, and he vetoed it because he said that the Congress had exceeded its authority in one little particular. Then it was that the Senator from Illinois said to himself that the President was right, and he wrote his bill so as to incorporate the recommendation of President Wilson, and they followed the instructions of President Wilson in framing the law accordingly. Since then the Attorney General of this administration has said that President Wilson was right in his contention. Yet they claim the Budget as a great achievement of this administration.

Let us go further:

Since Warren Harding took office the present Congress has reduced the annual aggregate of taxation by about a billion dollars. We have helped wipe off the statute books a score or two of nuisance taxes.

Yes; you took the tax off of gin fizz and you put it on bread. You call that saving taxes to the people. The poor fellow who has to pay his taxes does not see any relief by virtue of the removal of any taxes by this Congress.

Taxes! You are at work here every day and you sit up nights planning to put taxes on flour, and wheat, and bread, and meats, and sugar, and boots, and shoes, and everything else that a man has to eat to live or wear to exist.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And salt.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. And the Senator from Illinois is a party to all that nefarious scheme. I read further:

REDUCTION OF INCOME TAXES.

We have been able to reduce all income taxes, so that for everyone they are less, for example, than those paid in the British Isles.

I do not see my friend the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] present, but I remember how he led the fight when the revenue bill was before this body to make the wealth of the country bear its just proportion of taxation. I remember how he fought, and was assisted by this side unanimously, to reduce the income taxes of the men who make small incomes. I shall not forget how the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee stood there with his great power, not only as a Senator but as a great political leader, withstanding our assaults and combating the onslaughts we made here day by day to reduce the taxes of the poor man.

I shall not forget how he surrendered to the wiles and the influences of the White House, and tried to reduce the taxes on the wealth of this country—the taxes on the higher incomes. Yet he has the audacity now to parade it to the country, as the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, that he and his party removed some taxes from the people of the country. That was a miserable bill as you passed it. We tried to cure it as much as we could, and we did help it immeasurably; but if we had followed in the footsteps of the distinguished Senator from Illinois and his colleagues on the other side there would have been no relief to the man of small means in the paying of his income taxes.

So you are trying to undo what you did then by now imposing a tax upon everything that the poor fellow, who can hardly exist now, has to buy on the small wages that he is obtaining, and the smaller wages you and your party are trying to give to him. You are taxing the food which goes upon his breakfast table and the clothing which he wears upon his back.

Oh, if the American people knew what has gone on and what is going on now in the Congress of the United States and up at the White House! You pass special legislation to take care of certain special interests that pour out their contributions to you lavishly, as in the case of the National Cash Register Co. and as in the case of Wrigley, who comes from the Senator's State and city, with his chewing gum.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. If they knew, they would rise up in their might now, and where they could recall you they would do it. They are growing more impatient now because they have to wait a few more months in order to cut off your political head.

I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Mississippi will remember that according to the estimate of the Baltimore Sun the removal of wool from the free list to the tax list will cost the people over $300,000,000 a year.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and they look upon it complacently over there, and they smile about it and boast of it, and then they will go down to the big shepherds in the West and say, "Come across, boys; give us a fat contribution so we can fill up our purses and try to reelect ourselves." That is to give encouragement to the "gold diggers" and the "purse boys."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Inasmuch as the tariff duty is now 45 cents on wool and we have reduced it to 33 cents, 45 cents being the rate fixed in the emergency tariff law, for which a number of Democrats voted, I do not think there is going to be very much of an increase in taxation because of a reduction of 12 cents in the tariff duty on wool.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is a little fairer than his colleague from Illinois, because the Senator, while he does not admit it, knows that the so-called tariff duty of 45 cents, which he just mentioned, was placed there last year by a Republican Congress, and if guilt attaches you are responsible for it, and you should not now try to either appease your conscience or excuse your action by "getting out from under."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will say to my friend that I am very proud of the vote I cast for it.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator is. His conscience never hurts him.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But inasmuch as my namesake on the other side of the aisle has seen fit to inveigh against the high tariff duty on wool, I thought I would call his attention to the fact that the present bill proposes a reduction of 12 cents a pound on wool under the existing law, and that for the higher tariff duty a number of his own colleagues voted. I am not seeking to escape responsibility. I do not call it responsibility. I am delighted over the tariff and over its results.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it. The Senator is very consistent in all the wrongs he commits. The Senator injected himself into this discussion. So let me ask the Senator a question. He is now talking about wool. They used to call it Schedule K. Was it not the Senator's smartness, adroitness, and political shrewdness that caused the Senator to say to his friends on the committee—I do not know whether he called them "boys" or not, but I presume he said "fellows"—"It will not do to go to the country with these high rates on wool under the heading 'Schedule K.' Let us change it to a number." And accordingly it was changed, because he knew the thought of the name "Schedule K" was too odious to the people.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator can not answer it; no.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, I can answer it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to put the Senator in too bad. I withdraw the question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not want the Senator to withdraw it.

Mr. HARRISON. All right. I will ask the Senator the question, then.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi makes it embarrassing for me to answer the question, because he couples with it certain qualities and attributes which, perhaps, might be considered immodest if I were to accept them without remonstrance. But the bill originated in the House of Representatives in the Ways and Means Committee. They made the numbers; we did not. That was their business and not ours.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator still has influence on the other side of the Capitol.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator very much. I wish I had some here on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has. We love him very much personally over here.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator. It is mutual. What I want to say to my friend, however, is this: He speaks of the lavish contributions of the great captains of industry.

Mr. HARRISON. That $25,000 which Wrigley gave the other night was a pretty good contribution.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It was pretty good. I hope it will be more frequent.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator does.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Inasmuch as the last Democratic candidate for President made his campaign largely on the fact that we had $15,000,000 in our treasury, and toward the latter end of the campaign swelled it to $30,000,000, and inasmuch as——

Mr. HARRISON. From the result we can believe that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If we did, we very successfully bought up half the Democratic voters.

Mr. HARRISON. You expended it very well and got very good results.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Inasmuch as when the smoke of battle cleared away we found that we had $1,600,000 deficit——

Mr. HARRISON. You spent that much more than you thought you would have to spend.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And after all these months of hard work, and with some pretty good collectors trying to make up that deficit, we are still short half a million dollars——

Mr. HARRISON. You will get it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I hope so.

Mr. HARRISON. If the tariff bills stays here long enough you will get it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And inasmuch as the Republican senatorial campaign committee, of which my friend in front of me, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], is chairman——

Mr. HARRISON. He is a bad collector, though.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And of which I am an humble member—and inasmuch as these tremendous sums, this vast outpouring of the riches of the wealthy into the coffers of the Republican campaign do not seem to materialize——

Mr. HARRISON. They have had some pretty good results in some States where the elections have been held recently.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not know what the Senator means by that.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh! Michigan and Pennsylvania. Go ahead.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not anything more to say.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not mean Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no. We got on very well without any money in Indiana.

Mr. HARRISON. Which side?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Both.

Mr. HARRISON. Go ahead.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. At least both of the candidates out there so asserted, and, being honorable men, I believe them both. This talk about the campaign funds and all that sort of thing makes very interesting reading, and, of course, my friend talks on that as well as he talks on everything else.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am delighted to hear him, but, after all, his talk is not based on facts, because we did not have the money then, and we have no money now.

Mr. HARRISON. You will get it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We had a hole left out in Indiana, even. My good friend, the State chairman, became national chairman, and unfortunately left a bigger hole there. I will say that my friends and I meet once in a while and wonder where we are going to get the money to run the campaign, and while we are digging around for money, and they are charging us with having it, I think our friends on the other side are actually getting it for campaign purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. We are not passing any special legislation for anybody in order to get it. I think I have said all I care to say. I hope, in view of this revelation, that the chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] will now apologize to the country for having given out the statement.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, my always generous friend, the monologist from Mississippi, who commiserates with me because modestly when I am thrust aside I do not seek to go forward, by his own energy and capability and volubility has usurped the leadership of the Democratic Party. But even with those qualities I doubt if he wishes to base his criticism upon an incomplete statement. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD the complete statement which I offered to the press for publication Monday morning.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if he still adheres to the figures $7,000,000,000?

Mr. McCORMICK. I have nothing to qualify in the statement as I gave it to the press and as it will appear in the RECORD, if consent is given for its publication.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I have made a miserable failure in trying to convince the Senator of the error of his ways.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator has not failed to amuse the Senator from Illinois and the galleries, as usual.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Illinois is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

America is an oasis of order and prosperity in the world. With the resumption of general activity and general employment, the restoration of prosperity can be prevented or postponed only by continued procrastination and delay in the debate of the tariff or by general strikes.

Americans are realizing now as they have not before the great measure in which Congress and the administration have contributed to the recovery of business and agriculture and to the sharp reduction in unemployment. The country has hardly understood the magnitude of the task before Congress and the administration. The news from Genoa and Peking, from Moscow and Paris, and from Dublin and Athens has filled the newspapers almost to the exclusion of any account of the unremitting and unromantic labors of Congress to make good the waste of war and the profligate management of the Democratic administration during its anarchic last two years.

The unemployment in England to-day is something like six times per capita the unemployment of the United States. The unemployment in Scandanavia is increasing rather than decreasing, at the time when the Department of Labor reports that 2,000,000 idle men in America have gone to work during the last 90 days. While our agriculture has rallied under the stimulus of the Kellogg agricultural credits act and the emergency tariff act, the other great agricultural countries of the world remain nearly prostrate. Last year, in the terms of dollars, the exports of France and England amounted to a fraction more than they did during the last year preceding the Great War. German exports, computed in dollars, amounted to about one-third of their value during the last year before the war, while American exports were nearly 70 per cent greater than they were during the year before the outbreak of the conflict of 1914. The figures for the first months of this year show that these ratios still hold good. Thoughtful men and women will not forget that the improvement in agricultural prices restored the buying power of the farmer and so restored the interior market for the American manufacturer and found employment for the American workmen.

The Kellogg agricultural credits act was designed to meet one of the most serious economic emergencies in the history of the country. People must remember that before the machinery of the Finance Corporation, rehabilitated by the act, could be brought to bear upon the crisis, corn had fallen to 20 and 30 cents on the siding, whereas it is selling now from 45 to 50 cents at country elevator points. Cotton which sold on the farm for about 8 cents is now worth approximately 19 cents; wool on the western ranches which sold for as little as 17 cents, has doubled in value. The price of wheat at the country elevators has increased from 30 to 35 cents. The same is true of live stock. The price of hogs has risen from about $6 to about $10. The cattle men have come through, and breeding herds are no longer being sacrificed. Not only have thousands of farmers been carried, but hundreds and hundreds of banks have been saved from bankruptcy.

While the Kellogg credits act has been of inestimable value and importance, the drastic retrenchment of expenditure inaugurateed by the last Congress and carried forward by the present Congress and the economic and effective administration of public affairs under President Harding have contributed no less to the financial recovery of this country. I do not need to dwell upon the expenditure of $11,000,000,000 by the last administration for which we got during the war less than 200 cannon, less than 200 aircraft, one ship, and a nation-wide railroad wreck. But I think it extremely important to bear in mind the following table of demands for expenditure by the Executive, and appropriations made by Congress.

Estimates.

Fiscal year 1920	$11,445,446,051.98
Fiscal year 1921	6,267,453,196.06
Fiscal year 1922 to June 20, 1922	5,386,083,456.95
Fiscal year 1923 to June 20, 1923	3,888,779,720.28

Appropriations.

Fiscal year 1920	$6,454,596,649.56
Fiscal year 1921	4,780,829,510.35
Fiscal year 1922 to June 20, 1922	4,463,151,923.17
Fiscal year 1923 to June 20, 1923	3,710,499,001.97

Let it be clear that as compared with the sums sought to be spent by the Wilson administration during three years, and those appropriated by a Republican Congress, Congress saved the taxpayers $7,000,000,000.

Since Warren Harding took office we have paid off nearly a billion dollars of the national debt.

Since Warren Harding took office, under the McCormick-Good Budget Act, we have cut the annual expenditure of the Federal Government by a billion dollars, or about 25 per cent per annum. No other government in the world has done anything like it. Neither have any of the State or municipal governments, many of which continue to increase expenditure and taxation.

Since Warren Harding took office the present Congress has reduced the annual aggregate of taxation by about a billion dollars—by some eight hundred million dollars for the current calendar year, and by a billion dollars a year thereafter. We have wiped off the statute books a score or two of nuisance taxes which fell upon everything used by father, mother, sister, and sonny. We have been able to reduce all income taxes, so that for everyone they are less, for example, than those paid in the British Isles. The additional income tax exemptions have reduced by about a third the tax of the family man with an income of $5,000 a year or less. We not only have reduced the total sum of Federal taxation by about a billion dollars a year, but we have reduced it to such a point that the Government of the United States collects from its citizens per capita about one-third as much as does the Government of Great Britain.

Since Warren Harding became President the increase in the value of Liberty bonds, which have gone to par, amounts to about $3,000,000,000.

America will appreciate what has been done, and what it is sought to do, to relieve the shipper and the consumer of the tremendous burden placed upon both by the Wilson administration through the increase in the railroad rates and the imposition of transportation taxes. The increase in freight charges under the Democratic administration effected by the Interstate Commerce Commission by taxes or by decree of Doctor Wilson, amounted to about $3,000,000,000 a year. We have made a good beginning to lift this burden from the people. It is estimated that already it has been lightened by over half a billion dollars yearly.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL BANK CHARTERS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9527) to amend section 5136, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to corporate powers of associations, so as to provide succession thereof until dissolved, and to apply said section as so amended to all national banking associations, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and the amendment of the title so as to read: "An act to amend section 5136, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to corporate powers of associations, so as to provide succession thereof for a period of 99 years or until dissolved, and to apply said section as so amended to all national banking associations," and agree to the same.

WILLIAM M. CALDER,
CARTER GLASS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LOUIS T. MCFADDEN,
PORTER H. DALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CALDER. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I would like to have some explanation of it. It is rather an important measure.

Mr. CALDER. The House passed a bill extending the charters of national banks in perpetuity. The Senate amended it, extending the charters for 99 years. The House refused to concur in the Senate amendment and asked for a conference, to which we agreed. The House now recedes upon every one of its disagreements, and if the conference report is adopted the bill will go through exactly as the Senate passed it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a communication from the Public Committee on Coal. This is a committee of New York citizens interested in the coal situation, and they have written a letter to the President which contains some valuable suggestions in reference to the settlement of the existing trouble. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC COMMITTEE ON COAL,
New York City, June 17, 1922.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: By direction of the Public Committee on Coal I inclose you a copy of a letter addressed to President Harding by the committee. We know of your interest in the subject matter of the letter and count upon you to do whatever it is possible to do to make this first step toward a solution of the grave problem in the coal industry.

Yours faithfully,

MERCER G. JOHNSTON, Secretary.

PUBLIC COMMITTEE ON COAL,
New York City, June 17, 1922.

His Excellency WARREN G. HARDING,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The public committee on the coal strike, composed of business and professional men, has now held public hearings which have been sufficient to convince them at least of one element in the situation, namely, the necessity of a complete investigation of the whole coal industry by a Federal fact-finding body.

While the committee understands the attitude of the administration in refraining from intervening to settle the strike, it believes that this attitude does not in the least preclude the administration from moving to bring about such an investigation as alone can furnish a sound basis for settlement when the time for settlement comes.

The present anthracite deadlock turns in part on this question of whether there shall be a Federal commission empowered to obtain all the facts and publish them. The miners have assured this committee of their support of a Federal body, the purpose of which was purely that of fact finding, while the operators have not made clear to what extent they would submit to such an investigation.

The committee finds agreement practically universal that the troubles of the coal industry are of a nature that can not be cured by present methods of collective bargaining acting alone.

The metropolitan newspapers as a whole have taken a position illustrated by the following editorial from one of them:

"No commission could decide what constituted a fair wage without knowing something about the profits and costs of the mining companies. * * * A commission appointed to fix wages would have to do it by guess."

It is obvious indeed that when an industry has something about it that is fundamentally wrong, and yet no one can state what is wrong, the facts will have to be obtained and presented before there can possibly be a lasting peace in that industry.

The committee believes that no reasons whatever, of any force with well-informed and impartial minds, can be stated against a cooperation, by both sides of the controversy and by the Government, in immediately setting up through congressional action commissions for the determination of the essential facts in the bituminous and anthracite industries. The longer the delay in deciding upon such necessary investigation the more unfavorable will the situation become for a rational settlement of the present strike.

Yours respectfully,

NORMAN HAPGOOD, Chairman.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the other day in discussing the naval appropriation bill I asked permission to put into the RECORD as an appendix to and part of my remarks certain data and statements from Commander Cox, Captain Beach, Captain Knox, and others. The reporter's notes show that the request was made, but there was no response by the Chair. I took it for granted that there was no objection, and I now ask permission—the speech has not yet been printed—that I may put into the RECORD the excerpts and matter referred to in my former remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is ordered as requested by the Senator from Utah.

OPERATIONS OF EMERGENCY TARIFF ACT (S. DOC. NO. 224).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 284, agreed to April 28, 1922, a report on the operations of the rates carried in the emergency tariff act.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I ask that the report may lie on the table and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before proceeding may I correct the committee amendment on line 8, page 99, after the word "each," by inserting a comma. I ask that that correction may be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, we come now to a discussion of the most important schedule in the whole bill. Heretofore we have been discussing what tariff duties we should place upon chemicals, metal, and wood products. The schedule which we are now about to consider is of supreme importance to every man, woman, and child in America.

We are now to consider what tariff duties we shall place upon the food that our people consume, the products that are essential to life, the food supply of our country. I can conceive of no section of the pending bill being more important, requiring more careful consideration, because whatever we may say about what tariff duties may be fixed upon chemicals that are used by our industries, whatever we may say about metals that are made by our manufacturers, all of these products are only occasionally used by our people, and usually by only certain groups. But every household, every head of a family, every woman who markets, every person who lives in America, is bound to be interested in this schedule, because its various items are so intimately associated with the daily life of all.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to call attention to the unusual situation which confronts us at this time in connection with the drafting of the pending tariff bill. That has been already referred to by various Senators who have participated in the debate. I think it is generally believed that this is not the time to fix tariff duties. I think, however, that before we began the discussion of the effect that the duties proposed on agricultural products are likely to have attention ought to be called to the fact that a different condition exists in America to-day than ever before. Heretofore in our tariff discussions all claims for the necessity of protective tariff duties have been based upon the theory that certain articles were capable of being produced in America at a reasonable price and in sufficient quantities to supply the home demand if a reasonable tariff duty were levied to prevent American producers and American manufacturers being required to compete with cheap foreign labor.

The theory upon which the protective tariff duties have been levied, the theory of the Republican Party, as I have understood it, has been that duties should be levied to permit the production and manufacture in America of those commodities which were essential and necessary for our people and which could be produced here at a reasonable cost to our people if a reasonable protective duty were levied. That theory has been abandoned entirely in the pending bill. There has been no attempt whatever to determine whether or not a given commodity could be produced in this country at a reasonable cost under a protective tariff. There has been no attempt whatever in the drafting of this proposed legislation to confine the undemocratic action of bestowing special privileges on a class of our citizens to those commodities which could be produced in America almost as cheaply as they could be produced abroad if foreign competition was restrained through protective tariff duties.

It has been pointed out that we are a creditor nation; as such we must expect some of the goods and services of foreign countries to come here in order to receive pay for what we sell abroad. Whether we like it or not our industries are now dependent in part for our prosperity upon foreign trade. We are in the markets of the world. Twenty per cent of the agricultural products alone of this country are shipped annually to foreign markets; $2,500,000,000 worth of agricultural products raised in this country are sold in the foreign markets of the world. We must, under the present circumstances, be very much concerned about what we do here lest we may enact tariff legislation which will close the foreign markets of the world to us and deprive our manufacturers and agriculturists of the large volume of foreign business upon which they have come to depend. The business of America is no longer confined to the home market, and yet many close students of economics and of the operation of tariff laws honestly and sincerely believe that the effect of this proposed legislation will be to make American business men dependent in the future entirely upon the home market. To a considerable extent the present depression is due to the loss of the foreign market, and we ought to be most cautious and most careful in what we are doing now to prevent the loss of this important adjunct to the business of America, both the manufacturing and the agricultural industries.

One thing is certain from an impartial examination of the agricultural rates in this bill, and that is that a very serious and deliberate attempt has been made to close the door of Canadian trade and of Cuban trade with the American people. In fact, the advocates of the high rates of duty proposed to be levied upon agricultural products boldly proclaim that one of the purposes to be accomplished will be the elimination of all agricultural products coming into this country from Canada and the elimination of agricultural products coming from Cuba, these countries being the two principal ones which have competed, if, indeed, any countries have competed, with our own agricultural products.

I referred a moment ago to the fact that we export $2,500,000,000 worth of agricultural products. In the exportation of those agricultural products we compete in the markets of the world with the agricultural products of Argentina and some other South American countries, with the agricultural products of Australia, and with the agricultural products of India. Thus far we have been successful in meeting that competition; thus far we have been able to hold our own in the expansion and development of our foreign agricultural export trade in the markets of Europe; but if this bill shall serve the purpose which its advocates assert it will serve, namely, of shutting out from America the agricultural products of Canada and the agricultural products of Cuba, I ask Senators where are the agricultural products of those countries to go except to Europe, where they will compete in the markets of Europe with the agricultural products which we export in such very large quantities? May not those who claim to be trying to aid the farmers be engaged in defeating their own ends? Surely any move that will destroy one-fifth of the markets of our agriculturists will prove disastrous. The farmers more than any other class should be interested in holding on to our export business. Europe is a customer of the farmer; to the manufacturer she is a competitor. Herein lies a great difference in fixing tariff duties.

There are two theories held in regard to the effect of these duties on agricultural products. One theory is that the tariff duties on agricultural products levied in this bill will have no effect at all; that they are merely paper duties; that the whole scheme and plan is political and intended to deceive the farmers—to make them think they are getting actual protection and that they will thereby receive increased prices, when, in fact, those who vote for them well know they will not be effective. The other theory is that these duties will be effective; that they will be reflected in increased prices to the consumer; that the consumer will have to pay tribute to the farmer; and that a new era of prosperity to the farmer will follow the enactment of these high tariff duties on agricultural products.

Mr. President, Senators may take their choice. If the duties shall not be effective, then this whole movement is pure bunk; then this bill is a camouflage; then this bill is a piece of deception; it is a fraud and a humbug; and the rates are fixed merely for political purposes and with the end in view of leading the farmer into the belief that because tariff duties are levied on agricultural products in a legislative act he is to grow rich and become prosperous like the beneficiaries of high protection in the old days of high protection and big profits.

But if these duties are going to be effective, then the consumers of food supplies are to pay upon the things which they eat an indirect tax higher than ever before in the history of our country. Let us see just what effect these high tariff duties are to have if they become effective.

Mr. President, an attempt was made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], chairman of the agricultural tariff bloc, in a recent speech to show that the total per capita tax burden as a result of the proposed rates on agricultural products and provisions, including sugar, in this tariff bill will be only $1.45 and on all commodities only $3.29.

He asserts that the tax under the Payne-Aldrich bill in 1912 amounted to $3.20 per capita, 36 cents of which was on agricultural products, not including sugar, and 53 cents of which was on sugar. He also asserts that the tax under the Underwood bill was $2.85 per capita, which included a tax of 63 cents per capita on sugar and 25 cents per capita on agricultural products.

He claims that for the year 1920, while the Underwood law was still in effect, the per capita tax was $3.01, which includes a per capita tax of 75 cents on sugar and 23 cents on other agricultural products.

He estimates on the basis of statistics for the first nine months of the emergency tariff law that for one year under the emergency tariff law the per capita tax will be 98 cents on sugar alone and on other agricultural products 43 cents.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] reached these figures by a rather ingenious method. He took only the total revenue collected in a given year at the customhouses and divided that sum by the population for that year. For illustration, he says that in 1914 the United States collected in revenue on agricultural products the sum of $24,817,322, and that our population at that time was estimated at 97,297,515; therefore the per capita tax on agricultural products, not including sugar, was 25 cents.

But this method leaves out of consideration entirely the effect of these duties in increasing domestic prices. Is not this the very purpose for which these high duties on agricultural products are being proposed? Unless these duties do increase domestic prices, how is the farmer to be benefited by them? How is the farmer to increase his profits except by increasing his prices to reach the level of these new duties?

The Senator bases his idea of the tax burden to the consumers only on the tax paid on imports. The figures that I submit are based on the total consumption in this country multiplied by the increased tax levied in the proposed bill over the law of 1913.

If the rates proposed in this bill become effective, as he advocates, in increasing the prices of all agricultural products, we can readily estimate just what increased tax the agricultural schedule in the pending bill will levy upon our people.

Assuming our population to be 100,000,000 people (1914 estimate), the total tax because of increased prices of agricultural products due to the proposed tariff will be $1,316,569,449. (These figures, furnished by the Agricultural Department, only include increased tax on fresh meats, sugar, cereals, beans, potatoes, and apples.)

The same authority estimates the per capita increased tax at $13.15 9/10 over the Underwood Act; and the per capita increased tax over the Payne-Aldrich Act is $3.63 5/10.

The annexed table indicates the great burden that will be fastened upon the backs of the people of the United States by the tax on agricultural products if these duties become effective.

For my own State of Massachusetts the increased cost of living, through the increased prices of agricultural products, will exceed $52,000,000. In the light of these figures, who dares to dispute the tremendous increased cost in living that will follow the enactment of this tariff bill? Add to these stupendous figures the increased cost, because of the high tariff duties in this bill, of shoes, cotton and woolen goods, furniture, building materials, and so forth, and can any other word describe this bill better than iniquitous?

Increased cost in total and per capita consumption as affected by the proposed tariff, 1922.

NOTE.—The consumption and population of 1914–1918 are used because they are the last complete figures available. Population, based on the average term 1914 to 1918, 100,050,163. Other products upon which tariff duties have been increased, such as milk, butter, cheese, onions, vegetables, fish, and poultry, are not included in these tables.

Mr. President, these figures reveal the terrible consequences of high tariff duties on the bare necessities of life. At the very period when we are attempting to deflate the enormous costs of production and the excessive prices prevailing as a result of war conditions, it is proposed to increase the cost of living to the American people to the extent of $1,316,569,449 per annum.

It is unbelievable. It is inconceivable that any public man would for one instant seriously consider such a proposition. Yet, so great has been the pressure exerted on the majority party in Congress by the agricultural tariff bloc that unless the American people make emphatic protest without delay their living expenses for what they eat are to be increased at the rate of over one and one-quarter billion dollars per year.

As the figures are based upon the consumption and population for the average period from 1914 to 1918 in all probability with our increased population and the consequent increase in consumption, these figures should more definitely be estimated at one and one-half billions—a sum greater than the entire national debt of the United States at the time of our entrance into the World War.

Our people are to be inflicted with an indirect tax burden annually amounting to about one-fifteenth of our entire debt from the World War, excluding foreign loans.

The heavy income tax burdens, the excess profits taxes, and the high surtaxes which corporations and wealthy individuals have had to bear during and since the war sink into insignificance compared with the burden that the advocates of these agricultural tariff duties seek to force upon the great army of American toilers and consumers. Are the people of the United States ready to surrender without vehement protest just because the majority party in Congress have surrendered to the threats and intimations of the agricultural tariff bloc?

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should prefer to have the Senator ask me whatever questions he desires after I have finished my argument. I should like to develop it in my own way, and I think I can save time if the Senator will wait until a later time.

Mr. GOODING. I thought possibly at this time the Senator might have some figures as to the duties on manufactures, and how much they are reflected on the people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has declined to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will come to that; and the Senator does not disconcert me by any figures about protection upon manufactures. I will come to discuss the difference between protection to manufacturers and protection to agriculturists. Different principles underlie these industries, and at the proper time in the course of my argument I shall be very glad to discuss that phase of this subject.

Mr. President, can it be seriously denied that this bill attempts to make a raid upon the consumers of this country such as was never before dreamed of?

May I ask my Republican friends what explanation they are going to make to the industrial workers of this country, to the people in the industrial centers of this country, to the bankers, to the professional men, to the teachers, to that great army who are not beneficiaries of protective tariff duties, in the mills, and factories, and on the farms? What explanation is to be made for placing upon them a burden of $1,500,000,000 per annum?

It has been said that this bill was a bill to get the votes of farmers, to get the votes of laborers, and to get the votes of special interests. It may be a bill to get the votes of western farmers—I can not speak for that constituency—but it is not a bill to get the votes of the laboring people, because you can not reduce the wages of the laboring people as they have been reduced—from 30 to 50 per cent in the last year—and then propose legislation to increase materially the cost of the things they must have in order to sustain life itself and expect to get their votes.

Some reasons might be given in favor of laboring people sympathizing with high tariff duties. Something might be said—indeed, I have heard it said, and said with good political results—to the effect that working people should oppose the election of a Democratic Congress because it would mean tariff revision, a lowering of tariff duties, and thereby a lowering of the wages of the working people. I have heard that said, and I have known of its results politically.

Ah, but they can not be fooled now. Their wages have been reduced, their wages have been lowered, their wages have been materially cut, and now, with wages lowered, with wages cut, it is proposed to increase their costs of living. The laboring people have learned to their sorrow there was a good deal of difference between a wage of $5 a day when the cost of living is $4 a day and a wage of $4 a day when the cost of living is $5 a day, yet it is proposed through this legislation to tell the laboring man whose wages have been cut from $5 to $4 a day, and whose cost of living has been increased from $4 to $5 a day, that he ought to enthuse and cheer over this legislation and vote the Republican ticket in the next election.

Mr. President, are protective tariff duties a benefit to the farmer? Let us see. Everybody knows that wages to-day are fixed and determined more than ever upon a basis of cost of living. If this bill results in increasing the cost of living the laboring people will demand higher wages, and higher wages means that the farm workers will leave the farms and go into the cities, where higher wages are paid; as farm labor becomes scarce higher wages will be demanded, and the farmer himself will lose through the effort made to increase the prices of farm products, which must be bought and used by everybody.

But there is another aspect of this question from the farmer's standpoint which must be considered. How much protection is the farmer getting, anyway? How does that protection balance with the protection given to the things the farmer must buy? I have an interesting table on this phase of the issue.

For the first time it is claimed here that the farmer must be put on an equal footing with the manufacturer; that he must be given tariff protection, as the manufacturer has been given tariff protection; that he must be given an opportunity to acquire great wealth; that he must be given an opportunity to make money; that he must be given an opportunity to join the privileged classes of America who have benefited by high tariff duties in the past. Let us consider the difference between a protective tariff duty upon the product of the farm and a protective tariff duty upon the product of the manufactory.

HOW THE FARMER IS BEING FOOLED.

Mr. President, the friends of the farmer should be urging reductions in tariff duties on what he buys instead of trying to equalize the rates between agricultural and manufactured products. Manufacturers, like agriculturalists, get no benefit from tariff duties where there are no imports and where unrestricted competition prevails in the home market.

When the absence of competition permits monopolies to fix prices on trust-made goods not merely at the cost of production but at cost plus the duties, protective duties are indefensible even if there are imports. Such duties are equivalent to the issuance of licenses to the trusts to profiteer upon the public. Enormous profits and swollen fortunes have been the result of such protection in the past. The pending bill continues this nefarious system of levying high protective duties on import commodities likely to compete with trust-made commodities.

The manufacturers who benefit by protective tariff duties that are at all defensible are those engaged in producing commodities that either do not entirely supply the home market and must, therefore, compete with comparable imported commodities, or if they do supply the entire domestic market are threatened with competition through importations from abroad in such volume as to be a factor in reducing domestic prices. In such instances manufacturers may claim protection against cheap foreign labor by tariff duties that equalize the difference in the cost of production here and abroad; such tariff duties serve the purpose of permitting the manufacturer to obtain a price here equal to the price of production abroad plus duties collected at our customhouses upon the foreign-made competitive article.

But the agricultural industry in this country abundantly supplies the demands of the domestic markets—we export large amounts of agricultural products—and competition is so keen and widespread that prices on almost all products are fixed upon the basis of supply and demand at home and not upon the basis of the prices of imports which are negligible, except in the cases of citrus fruits, sugar, and nuts.

The following table shows to what extent various manufactured commodities that the farmer must buy are taxed and incidentally how the protective system penalizes him. Of what benefit is a protective tariff system to the farmer when even if effective he gets an average protection of 20 per cent on what he produces and must pay, on the average, 44 per cent protective tax on what he buys?

Comparison between ad valorem duties on agricultural products and ad valorem duties on articles farmer must buy.

The farmer is engaged in a business which is scattered all over the country, a diversified business, where there is keen competition, where there are millions engaged in the same business competing one with the other.

The table which I hold in my hand will give some idea of the extent of competition between the farmers, and competition is a factor in price fixing. The number of persons engaged in cattle raising in this country, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture, is 5,358,243, and the average production per farm is 12 cattle.

Contrast that kind of a business with the manufacturing business, where there are only a handful engaged in manufacturing a product, who can change the style and character of their product, who can indirectly combine with each other to control prices and stifle competition. There tariff duties may be effective; but with competition such as exists between the cattle raisers it is a very serious question if any tariff duties are effective.

Let us take one of the poultry products. Four million eighty-eight thousand one hundred and sixty-nine people who are commercially engaged in that business in this country have made reports, and the average sale of eggs by those people was 247 dozen per annum.

Let us take peanuts. Two hundred and thirty thousand three hundred and eighty people are reported as engaged in the production of peanuts, and the average sale by each per annum are 119 bushels.

Three hundred and seventy-seven thousand two hundred and twenty-two people are producing apples on a commercial basis, and the average sale by each is 261 bushels.

Four million eight hundred and fifty thousand eight hundred and seven persons are engaged in raising swine and selling them commercially, and the average sale annually by each of them is 12 swine.

I will not take the time to discuss the table further. I will read it.

This table shows the vast number of domestic producers who compete among themselves in supplying our markets with agricultural staples. This information obtained from the Department of Agriculture shows that competition is so extensive and general that tariff duties can not in general affect the prices received by the farmers. Supply and demand will regulate prices regardless of tariff duties, as imports of these products are negligible.

Mr. President, I have been calling attention to the difference in the effect of tariff duties upon the farmer and the manufacturer. Protective duties up to the time of the introduction of this bill, which were a benefit to the manufacturer, were based upon the necessity of encouraging the growing industries of the country. It was claimed that infant industries which only produced 20 or 40 or 50 per cent of the consumption, but which, if given a reasonable protective duty to keep out competitive commodities made by the cheap labor of Europe, could gain a foothold, become prosperous, and be able to supply at reasonable prices the necessities of our people.

Bear in mind that no person until the presentation of this bill ever before asked for protective duties upon any industry that took care of the entire consumption of this country. The farmer's business more than takes care of consumption. He exports 20 per cent of his production. So we have when we consider tariffs on agricultural products an entirely different proposition confronting us. Tariff duties upon products which are produced in such abundance have heretofore been held unnecessary. Tariff duties placed upon products that did not supply wholly our home markets helped such producers. Such producers through protection could charge a price equal to the cost of production plus the tariff duty paid at the customhouses of the country.

The bill completely abandons every Republican theory of protection. Trusts and over-producers of manufactured articles alike share in the benefits of the bill; also the industry that is only producing 3 or 5 per cent of the consumption, as well as the industry that is producing 95 per cent of the consumption. That is one of this bill's fatal defects. Nobody was asked, in levying a duty, "How much is your production? Are you able, if encouraged by tariff duties, to supply the demands of the American people?" That is not all we should ask, but "to supply the demand at a reasonable price and not at an exorbitant price?" Everybody who produces, everybody who manufactures has in this bill been given protection, and the result is that the American people are to be burdened as never before with increased prices as a result of these rates. If the average increase over the Underwood law for eight or ten of these agricultural products is $13, who dares to say what the increase will be when we add on all the other items named in the bill?

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that the farmer ought to be urging a reduction in tariff duties on the things that he buys. He ought to be protesting emphatically against any trust-controlled product in America receiving tariff protection. It is indefensible, it is vicious to permit an industry which absolutely controls prices of a commodity to increase its prices 25 per cent, as may be the case under the duty fixed in the bill on such articles as cash registers and many others that might be named.

Of course what the farmer takes in for the sale of his products he converts into the things that he and his family must use. The money comes in, let us say now, in increased amount by reason of the protection levied in the bill. Ah, but the money goes out, and on practically everything that he buys he is asked to pay 100 per cent increase protective duty over the protection given him. Let us see the figures.

Mr. President, I called attention a moment ago to the fact that it was boastfully claimed that one thing the bill would do anyway would be to shut out the products of Canada and Cuba. Canada is our best customer. Canada takes more of our products than any other country in the world. Tell me the bill is not going to destroy our export business? As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] just suggests, Canada takes twice as many of our goods as she sells to us.

I want to call attention to a table which shows the extent of business that we are doing with Canada, because the bill in many of its particulars is a special drive at Canada. Many of the imports which come into this country come over the line from Canada, particularly in the northeastern part of the country. My own section of the country buys milk, cream, butter, eggs, and sometimes meats, poultry, and other agricultural products, which are not produced in my section of the country in sufficient quantities to take care of the demand.

I hold in my hand a table or diagram which shows the amount of American products which were exported during the month of May to the different countries in the world. Canada leads off. Canada's per capita purchases from the United States was $6.28. Cuba is next, the country against which another drive is being made to keep its agricultural products out, had a per capita purchase of $3.23. Next was Holland, $1.86; next the United Kingdom, $1.59; next Australia, and so on.

The countries that were the principal buyers of our exports in that one month were as follows: Italy, $7,000,000 worth of products; Japan, $23,000,000; France, $19,000,000; Germany, $36,000,000; Mexico, $11,000,000; Argentina, $7,000,000; Australia, $7,000,000; United Kingdom, $13,000,000; Holland, $13,000,000; Cuba, $10,000,000; Canada, $44,000,000—three times as much as Germany, and more than three times as much as the United Kingdom.

I think there is one thing the bill will do. The bill is to confine the business of America to our home markets. You may succeed in doing that, but when you do that you will destroy and decrease the business of this country 20 per cent. You have shut out and you are shutting out the products of the whole world. You are building a wall around us and you are saying, "We want no business with anybody. We are willing to sell but unwilling to buy." What fools such a policy will make of our business seekers looking for orders for American products in the markets of the world.

Mr. GOODING. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I should merely like to say that the emergency tariff law rates in some respects are higher than are the rates in the pending McCumber bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will not yield now to the Senator from Idaho. I will gladly yield to him when I get through with my argument, but I want to pursue the course of my argument in my own way.

Mr. President, what is going to become of the $2,500,000,000 worth of agricultural products which we export from this country if we build this tariff wall and keep everything from coming in? What is to become of that? Are the people in the world going to come to us on their knees and beg for our agricultural products, when we have closed our gates to their goods?

Senators on the other side of the Chamber will close the door in another way. If the rates on agricultural products shall be effective and their prices are thereby increased, then the foreign markets will be closed, because the nations of the world will not come here for high-priced agricultural products. Whichever position Republican Senators take, they can not justify these high rates of duty.

It is said that this was a bill to stop the American people from eating. I can not understand the political sagacity, I can not understand the policy of the Republican Party, on the eve of a political campaign permitting their opponents to show, as they can show, as they will show, and as they have shown on this floor, that Congress is proposing to pass a law which taxes the poor people of America—the rich always can stand taxation—which taxes the poor people of America, in the midst of the greatest depression ever known in this country, higher than they were ever before taxed. What answer can Senators on the other side of the Chamber make to these figures? What answer can be made to the consuming public of America when attention is called to the excessively high and unreasonable and indefensible duties on agricultural products which have been levied in the pending bill? What is the reason for these duties?

I come now to discuss a very important feature of this proposed legislation. I want to ask the Senate this question: I want to know why the Republican House of Representatives has been so derelict in its duty and so neglectful of the farmer? I want to know why nearly every rate on agricultural products fixed in this bill by the other House has been repudiated and a substantial increase made by the Finance Committee of the Senate? Either the House has been derelict in its duty; it has been indifferent or neglectful of the farmer, or the Committee on Finance has levied duties which even the Republican members of the other House could not in conscience support. Either the House rates are just or the Senate rates are just. If the House rates are just, then the Senate rates are indefensible, as I shall show by a table which I shall submit, proving that in the bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee the rates of duty upon agricultural products have been increased from 20 per cent to 350 per cent over the House rates. What is the explanation? The explanation is that the Senate has an agricultural tariff bloc while the House of Representatives has none; and the rates in the bill now pending were made largely through the influence of the Senate agricultural bloc.

Mr. President, the influence of the agricultural bloc on the Senate Finance Committee is shown by the following increases in the tariff duties on agricultural products in the Senate bill as compared with the House bill:

[3] Produced in Florida in small quantities but just as much entitled to high duties given citrus fruit growers of California, who produce only a trifle of our consumption. Florida also is represented in Congress by Democrats.

Much has been said in Congress and in the press relative to the influence of the agricultural tariff bloc with the Senate Finance Committee in fixing high tariff duties on agricultural products. That such influence and pressure was successfully used can not be denied in view of the information contained in the table presented, which demonstrates that the Senate Finance Committee amendments increase the House rates from 20 to 350 per cent.

That the Senate Finance Committee, if left uninfluenced, would in all probability have reduced the House rates is evidenced by their action upon those agricultural products in which the agricultural bloc was not interested. The rates on agricultural products of the States not represented by the agricultural tariff bloc were either left unchanged or reduced.

It is also to be noted that rates were invariably lowered on agricultural products raised in the Democratic States of the South. It is inconceivable that a political party would carry partisanship to such an extent as to discriminate in tariff legislation against the products of those States which are represented in Congress by members of the minority party, yet tables submitted support such a claim.

This action of the majority places all the burdens of protection on the agriculturists of the South, without giving them any of the benefits claimed for protection.

There can be no doubt now of the powerful and effective influence of the agricultural tariff bloc. Whatever we may say in condemnation of their selfish interest and provincialism, the attitude of those who yielded to their influence is more reprehensible, because many of them represent constituencies that will have to pay dearly for the increased costs in living following such unjustifiable and pernicious tariff duties.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this schedule as a whole any longer. Let me say that I have no feeling but that of sympathy for the farming interests of this country. I know they have suffered much during the recent depression. I do think that when we come to consider the question of establishing protective tariff duties upon agricultural products we should consider the consumer as well as the producer. I think that when we come to consider placing tariff duties which are taxes imposed upon our countrymen, we ought to be very, very careful to be fair and just and reasonable to all the interests and to all classes in our country.

I wait to see what answer will be made from the other side of the Chamber. I wait to see if the claim is that these duties are not effective and will not be reflected in prices. If that is the claim then this bill is a fraud, because no one can tell me that protective duties upon manufactured products have not been in the past chiefly and largely effective, and that prices have not increased as tariff duties have increased.

I am not unmindful of the difference. The demand for agricultural products in this country is not sufficient to consume what we produce, while the demand for manufactured products in most instances is enough to consume more than we produce, and an altogether different tariff principle applies under those circumstances.

If the answer is that these duties are effective, then I ask for some explanation; I ask for some reason advanced why the people of America must be burdened with this heavy tax; why for the first time we have increased the tariff duties so excessively, to such an extreme extent, so sweepingly and so extensively, upon the things which are necessary for life itself.

Mr. President, as we progress with the discussion of this schedule I hope that the committee may realize the folly and the injustice of levying such high rates upon the agricultural products named in this bill, and I hope that they will follow the course pursued in some of the other schedules, where, after attention has been called to the excessive rates fixed on some of the products named, there has been an occasional effort made to reduce those rates.

I do not know of any schedule in this bill that is so indefensible; that is going to result in such serious consequences to the American people; that is going to upset our economic conditions so much as the agricultural schedule.

Mr. President, I yield the floor. I am prepared now to answer any questions that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] or any other Senator desires to ask me.

Mr. GOODING. I do not think I care to ask the Senator any questions

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall answer only a few of the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts. We have now nearly reached the hour of 4 o'clock, and the only amendment we have acted on in the bill so far is that we have agreed to place a comma after the word "each." I hope to get some action beyond that before the day closes, and therefore I shall abbreviate my remarks very much.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not object to my discussing for an hour such an important schedule as this one.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; not at all. I object neither to the argument nor to some of the things that I can not understand in the argument.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that yesterday our good friends upon the other side discussed all day the little item of shingles, and with great learning and with great ability, and in the main I agreed with the arguments of most of the Senators and voted with them; so the Senator from North Dakota can not object to the discussion that has taken place here to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, do not think for a single moment that I am objecting to the argument. The argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts was along the lines of this tariff. It was a pertinent argument, and proper from his standpoint.

Mr. KING. As were the arguments of our Republican friends yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I am simply excusing myself for not going fully into an answer to what the Senator has said this afternoon, because I want to get a vote on one or two of the items if possible.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that every man who labors in the city, that every woman who sews in the city, that every clerk and every other kind of individual who lives in the great cities, is interested in a tariff upon food products; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that every man who labors upon the farm for a wage that is one-tenth of what his neighbor in the city receives for an equal number of hours is also interested in this food schedule and in the tariff.

I want to tell him that every man who gets up at 4 o'clock in the morning to attend to his chores and milk his cows and feed his horses, and gets out at daylight in the field, is also interested in what he is going to get as a result of his labor; and every good wife that gets up at half-past 3 in the morning to get the breakfast for that farmer is also interested in this tariff schedule; and I call his attention to the fact that every little child with tattered skirts and bare feet that is running around under granaries and barns to find a stray egg in order to get a dozen or two dozen or four dozen eggs in order that she may buy stockings for the fall is also interested in this tariff bill and in what she is going to receive for those eggs. I want the Senator, before he dries his eyes after discussing the woes and cares of those who live in the cities, to take just one cursory glance over the country, look at the one-third of the population of the United States that live there, see how meagerly they live, see how economically they dress, go out and see them going to their churches upon a Sunday morning, even in their best array, and then compare it with the appearance of the girls and the boys who are coming out of the churches in the great cities and who dress as well during the week days as they do on Sunday. I am considering that they have an interest in the price of the things which they produce; and I hope the Senator will not refrain from extending his sympathy to those who are most in need of that sympathy and of whatever assistance can be rendered them through a tariff or through any other means that we can devise.

The Senator knows just as well as I know that more or less through a system of protection we have builded up the great cities, we have builded up the price of labor, we have increased the great profits in the cities, until there is one plane of living in the country and another and much higher plane of living in our cities. Does the Senator then condemn those who want to bring the farmer up just as nearly as possible so that his earning capacity may to some extent measure up more nearly to the earning capacity of the millions who live in our great cities? I admit that we can not do that at a single stroke. I admit that we can not pull down the price of labor in the great cities to-day so that it will meet the comparable earning capacity of those who labor upon the farm. To attempt to do it at a single stroke would bring consternation to the whole country.

What is our duty, then? Not to pull down the one, but to raise up the other gradually, step after step, until we secure a condition of greater equality between the residents and the earners of our great cities and those who live upon the farms. I may not live to see the day, but I pray to God the day will arrive when the boy and girl out on the farm will have as many of the comforts of life as the brothers and sisters who live in the great cities, and toward that my effort, though weak, will be directed in the making of this tariff bill.

I agree with the Senator that we have raised the rate on nearly every agricultural product above what the House fixed. I will take my share of the responsibility for so doing. We would have done so, irrespective of farmers' blocs, in my opinion. I am glad to agree with them. I am for any assistance which they have rendered in securing greater justice for our agricultural class. It is equally true that we cut down practically every rate which the House fixed on the manufacturer's product.

Thus, taking our bill as a whole and comparing it with the bill as it passed the House, we have raised the duties on agricultural products and we have lowered the duties on manufactured products. Some Senators think we have not gone far enough. That may be true; but we aim to give reasonable protection to both the agricultural and to the manufacturing industries of the country.

I have stated before that we have from year to year so raised the standard of cost in the field of production, in the manufacturing industries, that it requires a greater equivalent ad valorem to give them protection, with their higher labor costs, than it does upon the ordinary agricultural products, and we have not been hesitant in giving a higher rate where that higher rate was demanded.

The Senator tells us that unless we buy from a country we can not sell to that country. How often has that false assertion been made and how many years have the facts discredited it? Let the Senator from Massachusetts take the American trade with the United Kingdom for the last 50 years and he will see that under a protective tariff we have sold to the United Kingdom from two to four times as much as we have bought from the United Kingdom. Let me ask the Senator in all good faith how many years is it going to take to demonstrate to him that his theory is not right? One year? Two years? We have demonstrated it for 50 years in our trade with Great Britain.

Mr. President, the people of any country buy where they can buy to the best advantage; they sell where they can sell to the best advantage. If Great Britain can get her wheat any cheaper from India or from Russia or from Australia, she is going to get it there, and if she buys from us she does so because she has to do it. She comes over here and buys our cotton because she can not get it anywhere else. What does she do with it? She manufactures it and sells some of it back to us, but most of it she sells to India, to South Africa, to South America, to Australia, to Canada. She is interested in buying where she can buy best and selling where she can sell to the best advantage; and there is nothing on earth in the proposition that one country has to trade evenly with another country—certainly not in the same things which each produces.

Two boys may trade 50-cent jackknives with each other for years, and neither of them would be any better off at the end of the time. It is only when one sells something that he does produce to another who sells something not of the same kind, but that is not produced by the first, that we get any kind of proper, economical trade.

We have the cotton here, and if we can make the cotton cloths here it is all nonsense for us to say that we will send our cotton over to Great Britain, sell it to Great Britain, and then buy it back from Great Britain. Let us sell what we have, produce what we can, and let Great Britain sell what she has, and sell it where she can, and in that way you will get the best economic and commercial conditions in the world.

I will not say I am entirely surprised at the Senator's argument, because the argument has been made very often in the matter of the rates of duty upon agricultural products. Senators on the other side seem to be afraid of taking one horn or other of the dilemma. They want to say two things; they want to say, first, that the duties on these food products do not increase the prices, and therefore they do not do the farmer any good; and in the next breath they want to say to the city dweller that they do increase the prices, and therefore that they harm him.

So the Senator from Massachusetts says that you can take either one of these propositions. Oh, no, Senator, let us not take either one; let us take the one we believe in and stick to it. Let us make the same argument out on the farm that we make in the city.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Which is the Senator's argument?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give mine, and give it right now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator believe these duties will be effective in raising the prices of agricultural products?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me give my idea, if the Senator will hold his soul in patience. I do not believe that one man gets a better price for a thing that he has to sell unless somebody pays a better price. I am willing to stand on that proposition. If the farmer sells his bushel of wheat, under a tariff duty, for 20 cents more than he would sell it for without a tariff duty, somebody pays that 20 cents.

I am not prepared to say that in every instance the final consumer who buys the loaf of bread is going to pay that 20 cents in the added cost of that loaf of bread. He may or he may not. In the case of a great many articles there is such a wide spread between the foreign price and the final selling price to the consumer that a duty may be absorbed twenty times over and need not be carried on to the ultimate consumer.

We had before us a short time ago a hat, which cost 96 cents in England, and was sold in New York for $7. The duty on the hat was 50 per cent ad valorem. The duty, therefore, would have been 48 cents.

I do not think that duty was considered at all in selling that 96-cent hat for $7. It was not carried on to the consumer. Every article will sell for what the trade will bear, and I am coming more and more to believe that that is generally the rule of sales, rather than close competition. Often competition is such that it may seriously affect the price. I can take half a hundred articles, in my mind at this moment, and show that the duty is not considered at all; it is a mere bagatelle. The duty is not paid by the consumer, but the consumer pays what the trade will bear.

I found that that $7 hat was sold the other day by the same company for $4.25. They did not lose anything when they sold it for $4.25, having paid 96 cents for it. They simply sold it for what, in their judgment, the trade would bear, and the little 48-cent duty was not considered at all in the matter of fixing the price of that hat.

Now, the Senator knows my position. I think that a duty of 30 cents a bushel on wheat will sometimes give us 30 cents a bushel better than the world's level of price, and sometimes make it not more than half of that, but it will be between those two rates. I believe if we had no grinding in bond whatever, we would measure up very closely one year after another with the full amount of the duty. But I do not see that with a big world crop and a big surplus of our northern spring wheat we would at all times secure the full benefit of that duty. I do say that with a short crop, and the Canadian product kept out entirely, we would get mighty close to the additional amount which would measure the tariff duty, and the statistics running over 20 or 30 years of our tariff and nontariff periods will show that.

The Senator has to take one side or the other in this case. I think, when we take the question of cream, that ordinarily there is not a sufficient spread between the farmer's price and the consumer's price to take up the duty. Therefore the consumer will undoubtedly pay the greater part of that tariff duty. I think that is true with eggs and many other things, probably milk and a number of other things. All my answer on that is that the man who earns $5, $6, and up to $10 a day can afford to pay a few pennies a day extra to help the farmer make a living. I am assuming that it costs more and that it will be borne by the consuming public to a considerable extent.

The Senator asked what answer are you going to make to the industrial workers for their increased tariff upon breadstuffs and upon other agricultural products? Very well, now, Mr. Industrial Worker, you tell me what you receive a day for your labor. Then tell me what the farmer's son, with hoe in hand, is receiving for his labor. He is willing to allow you to still keep up your earnings. He does not want to reduce your earnings. But he does want you to be willing to pay him a little more for the thing which he produces that he may live at least partially as well as you do, and may have as much money to expend during the year as you have. That is all he is asking. Are you willing to grant it to him?

But I can give it upon another theory. The same principle of protection which is to give this farmer boy a little more for the cream and the milk he produces helps you to maintain your job above the British workman's job, above the French workman's job, and many times above the German workman's job. Now, are you willing to go down to their standard of wage? You say no, and I say no. I do not want you to do that. But I want you to be willing to help out the agriculturist, to extend to him the helping hand and assist him to better wages for his labor.

Let us see what it means to you. You consume a barrel of flour a year. Suppose that every penny we place upon wheat and upon flour is carried into the bread which you buy. We have given 78 cents per hundred pounds on flour. A barrel of flour is 196 pounds, and I will give you 4 pounds extra and say you consume 200 pounds of flour a year. Therefore, you consume $1.56 in tariff, as the additional cost, for a whole year of 365 days; and for that which amounts to half a penny a day, a penny every two days, you are able to keep your job upon a protected market. I say that you can pay for it.

Now, it is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts argues, that the farmer only gets a 25 per cent duty upon his cream. The Senator said in substance—I do not know that I have his figures, but I state what he meant—that the tin pail into which the farmer milks has a protection of 40 per cent. That is true. Let us suppose, at least, that it is true. What happens? He buys a tin pail once in three years. He sells 13 quarts of that cream many times in one day out of that same pail. Is he not a little ahead in having protection upon the cream that enables him to pay the 15 cents extra upon the tin pail once in three years?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I know what the Senator would say, that he buys a good many things, which he does. He does buy a great many things, but no man can live, or live honestly and properly, who does not lay up a little each year, who does not sell more than he buys. The farmer buys a pitchfork once in five years, if he does not loan it to his neighbor. He buys a monkey wrench that lasts 10 years. He takes his wheat to market in the fall of the year, and he takes 100 bushels. He does not come back with a wagonload of monkey wrenches or pitchforks. If he did, of course, he would not be anything but a loser in the long run.

What the laborer is interested in a thousandfold more than in the price of what he buys is the price at which he can sell his labor. What the farmer is interested in is not so much the price of the pitchfork that he buys once in five years as he is in the price of a bushel of potatoes, a bushel of corn or flax or rye, and the gallon of milk or cream which he sells every day. We are trying to give him a protection that will enable him to continue to sell, and in order to do that we have to give a protection to the two-thirds of the American population who eat and consume his products. We have to give them a job, and a job in the United States. We are trying to do that in this bill, and I think we are doing it.

That, in general, Mr. President, is my view upon the question of protection to the agriculturists and protection to the manufacturers. We are living upon a higher labor plane. We are living upon a higher and more expensive plane of expenses. We can go down to the level of other countries, but I do not think it is for our interest to do so. If the tariff can smooth out inequalities, the greatest inequality that exists to-day is the inequality between the farmer's labor and what he gets for it and what the average citizen in the great cities secures for his labor. Therefore I am in favor of lifting the farmer's product to a plane of equality, just as much as it is possible to do so.

I am not blind to the fact that we are exporting heavily. It often happens that our tariff duties will not amount to a great deal in revenue, but anything that adds to our surplus in the United States, which is the principal field of consumption, and therefore of price making, can not help, by the very law of supply and demand, but drag down the prices. Wherever I think I can loosen that drag chain upon American agriculture, I am going to try to do it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, before moving an amendment to the committee amendment to the first item in the schedule I want to answer very briefly the Senator's argument. I want to say that I believe these duties will become effective in every instance when the American demand for a given product is greater than the production.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to say that is the time we need it most?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that in the case of many of these products there has never been a time when we have needed a tariff duty for protection.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I finish my statement, please?

As I have understood the Republican theory of protection, it was that when we were exporting a certain product there was no justification for a tariff duty upon that product; that the only justification for levying a tax upon the people of the country was to develop industries so that the people could have certain commodities at a reasonable price, and never before, until this bill was brought before the Senate, has it been argued that even products which were produced beyond the demands of our people and were being exported ought to bear a tariff duty, and that such a tariff duty should become effective in increasing prices.

I want to say further that the purpose, the intent, the desire is to make this tariff effective. That is why you put on the duties. You are going to tell the farmer that they are effective and you are going to tell the consumer that they are not effective. The Senator, as I gather from his own statement, said in substance——

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, will not the Senator be fair?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator said, "I do not think they are effective always, but I do think they will be effective at times." Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator said, "These tariff duties will not always be effective, but they will at times be effective, and in many cases effective."

Mr. McCUMBER. I say upon wheat, for instance, that is true. I am speaking of exports. I think upon most of them, like cream and dairy products, they will be effective during the entire year, and that it will add so much to the final cost of those products. I have tried to be perfectly fair with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If agricultural products are being produced in this country and manufactured products are being made in this country away beyond our demands and are being exported in large quantities to other parts of the world, then a tariff duty can have no effect, a tariff duty can not lift the price; but a tariff duty does lift the price and does increase the price when the production is less than the demand. That is the whole principle upon which the Republican Party has advocated protection in the past, that infant industries, growing industries, if given a protective tariff, could increase their price to the consumer, could charge more, and be able to compete with foreign-made commodities and foreign-made products produced abroad at cheaper prices than here.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING. If the Senator's statement is correct, then it seems to me that it will be necessary for him completely to revise the figures which he has given to the Senate this afternoon. If, when there is a surplus, a tariff duty is not effective in increasing prices, then that is true of wheat and is also true of many other things which the Senator has mentioned. Therefore, in that case, there is not any need to be alarmed, so far as the laboring man is concerned. I do not myself agree with the Senator. I think supply and demand in a large measure have something to do with the prices. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a protective tariff has the effect of limiting the supply.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator think the tariff rates proposed will be effective in increasing prices?

Mr. GOODING. I think supply and demand are a mighty factor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then, why not be honest with the farmer——

Mr. GOODING. Just let me answer the question, if the Senator please.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. GOODING. When there is overproduction and a great supply of wheat or of anything else is shipped into an already glutted market the price of the commodity is driven down. There is not any question about that at all. If there is anything to which the American people should be protected, it is in the commodities of which they produce all they consume. It would be nothing less than a crime to permit Canada to ship in 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, as she did a year ago last fall, and break the wheat market. Such things have happened to us and they will happen again. The whole world for some reason or other seems to want to market farm products here in America.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is peculiarly fitting that the attack on the agricultural schedule should come from New England, and especially from the great State of Massachusetts, and from a Democratic Senator, because if there is any State of the Union which has been protected for a hundred years, particularly as to everything which is manufactured, regardless of whether the Democratic Party or the Republican Party has been in power, it is the State of Massachusetts, and, so far as that is concerned, all the States of New England.

The Senator from Massachusetts is quite correct that there is a material increase in the proposed duties in the present bill over the House rates. I am not going to occupy much time, Mr. President, for the condition of my throat will not permit me to discuss the question as I should like to do; but I desire to say that this is the first time that New England has not framed the entire tariff bill; this is the first time that the West has had a sufficient number of Members on the Finance Committee to insist upon a square deal to agriculturists as well as to manufacturers, who heretofore have framed tariff bills.

That is the reason, if Senators please, that we have a tariff bill before the Senate that is fair, so far as agriculture is concerned.

The Senator from Massachusetts appears to be very much alarmed that increased prices will have to be paid by the consumers because, as he says, there is an increase in the tariff on agricultural products of 20 per cent ad valorem, but the 40 per cent tariff duty on manufactures does not seem to alarm him at all. I can not understand the Senator from Massachusetts. I can not understand a Democrat or anyone else who advocates free trade for the farmer and then is willing to accept a high protective duty for the industries in his State. I can not understand the man who does not know and feel and understand that the manufactured article, the clothing he wears, is just as much a necessity as is the food that he eats. All are essential to civilization; all cost labor to produce, and all cost labor to buy. If it is true that the tariff on agricultural products is a tax, then the duty on manufactured articles is a tax. That the Senator must admit.

Mr. President, the farmers of this country are asking merely for a square deal. The farmers of this country are willing and anxious to give to the manufacturers fair and reasonable protection; I do not know of any exception to that rule on this side of the Chamber; but Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not willing to give the farmers a square deal. They have always been enemies of agriculture, so far as the tariff is concerned, and have considered the product of the labor of the farmers as raw material for the manufacturers.

If the Senator from Massachusetts does not object, I should like to have read into the RECORD an interview with him which appeared in the Washington Post, for I want the farmers who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to understand thoroughly the position of the Senator from Massachusetts. Does the Senator object to having read the interview with him that appeared in the Post in order that it may become a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that I used in my speech most of the interview to which the Senator refers. I have used the table upon which that interview was based.

Mr. GOODING. The Senator used the table, but he did not refer to deflation and how seriously it would be to have inflation at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the table going into the RECORD.

Mr. GOODING. Very well; then I will ask to have the interview to which I refer read, because my voice will not permit me to say very much this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read from the Washington Post of Monday, June 26, as follows:

Increases in tariff duties proposed on fresh meats, sugar, cereals, beans, potatoes, and apples, if effective, would advance the cost of those commodities to American consumers by a total of $1,316,569,449 annually, Senator WALSH, Democrat, Massachusetts, said yesterday in a formal statement.

He explained that this estimate had been prepared by the Department of Agriculture at his request and was based on the total consumption in this country, multiplied by the increased tax proposed in the new bill over the law of 1913.

Senator WALSH made public a table prepared by the department showing the increased per capita cost per annum on such items would be as follows:

Barley, $0.094; buckwheat, $0.007; corn, $4.077; oats, $1.309; rye, $0.062; wheat, $1.792; sugar, $0.490; beef, fresh, $2.714; mutton, $0.159; pork, $0.736; beans, $0.130; potatoes, $1.323; apples, $0.397; total, $13.159.

"These figures reveal the terrible consequences of high tariff duties on the bare necessities of life," said Senator WALSH. "At the very period when we are attempting to deflate the enormous costs of production and the excessive prices prevailing as a result of war conditions, it is proposed to increase the cost of living to the American people to the extent of $1,316,569,449 per annum.

BLAMES THE FARM BLOC.

"It is unbelievable. It is inconceivable that any public man would for one instant seriously consider such a proposition. Yet so great has been the pressure exerted on the majority party in Congress by the agricultural tariff bloc that unless the American people make emphatic protest without delay their living expenses for what they eat are to be increased at the rate of over $1,125,000,000 per year.

"The heavy income-tax burdens, the excess-profits taxes, and the high surtaxes which corporations and wealthy individuals have had to bear during and since the war sink into insignificance compared with the burden that the advocates of these agricultural tariff duties seek to force upon the great army of American toilers and consumers. Are the people of the United States ready to surrender without vehement protest just because the majority party in Congress have surrendered to the threats and intimidations of the agricultural bloc?"

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, that is such a splendid article and so clearly defines the position of the Senator from Massachusetts and the position of the Democratic Party, and indicates so well that there can not be any inflation so far as agricultural products are concerned, that I want it to become a part of the permanent RECORD.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the duties on the manufactured products of his State as provided by the Underwood-Simmons law. The Senator very kindly figured that the duties in the pending bill on farm products average only 20 per cent. I find in Schedule L, paragraph 314, covering silks and silk goods, that the present Democratic Underwood-Simmons law imposes a duty on pile fabrics of 50 per cent ad valorem. That is the rate of duty in the free-trade Underwood law, which is free trade only so far as farm products are concerned.

In the same schedule on handkerchiefs the duty is from 40 to 50 per cent ad valorem; on mufflers, from 40 to 50 per cent ad valorem; on belts and suspenders, 45 per cent ad valorem; on ready-made clothing, 50 per cent ad valorem; on yarns, thread, and so forth, from 35 to 60 per cent ad valorem.

I come now to schedule K, of the Democratic Underwood-Simmons law, concerning which we have heard something to-day. Under that schedule, which covers wool and manufactures of wool, on woven carpets the duty is 50 per cent. Yet, under that law, carpet wools are on the free list, and wool was never so low and carpets were never so high as they are to-day.

In the same schedule of the present law, on woolen-pile fabrics the duty is 45 per cent ad valorem; on cloth, knit fabrics, 35 per cent ad valorem; on ready-made clothing, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Then coming to Schedule I, covering cotton goods, we find that on ready-made clothing the present Democratic Underwood law imposes a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem; on pile fabrics, a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem; on curtains, a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem; while cotton itself is on the free list. On table covers the duty imposed is 35 per cent, and so on down the list. Mr. President, I ask that the table from which I have quoted, showing the rates of duty on certain articles imposed by the present law, may be printed in the RECORD, because all the way through those duties run from 30 to 60 per cent ad valorem. I might say that there are lower duties in the same schedule, but the ones to which I have referred are high duties in the Underwood law. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts objects to a duty on agricultural products of 20 per cent ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the table referred to by the Senator from Idaho will be printed in the RECORD as part of his remarks.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I think every American citizen understands that agriculture can not go on if we carry it back to where it was two years ago. A crisis overtook the agricultural and live-stock industry of this country that practically wrecked and ruined the whole country. In my State 26 banks in the southern part of the State had to close their doors. If it had not been for the emergency tariff act and the War Finance Corporation act, we would have had just five banks left in my State, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said that if it had not been for those two acts—the War Finance Corporation act and the emergency tariff act—there would not have been a bank left in the State of Utah. That was the condition that confronted the West when the emergency tariff bill was passed. The Senator would carry us back to that condition. He would not have any inflation at all.

I want to read here from the Crop Summaries for 1921, 1920, and 1919, as reported by the Agricultural Department.

For the year 1919 we had—and I will read just the first few sets of figures—97,170,000 acres of corn, and it sold for $3,780,000,000. In 1921 we had 103,850,000 acres of corn, and it sold for $1,302,000,000, or very much less than half, if you please, of what the crop sold for in 1919; and I want to say to you that there was very little difference in the cost of production in 1921 and in 1919 as far as the farmer is concerned. Possibly his labor was a little cheaper, but practicaly everything he bought was still at the top notch at that time; and so it ran all down through the list, Mr. President. The wheat crop, if you please, of 1919, of 75,000,000 acres, sold for $2,080,000,000, while the wheat crop of 1921, with 62,000,000 acres, sold for $737,000,000—a little less than one-third, if you please, of what the crop sold for in 1919.

This report gives the prices of all the principal agricultural crops in America for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921. I shall not read them all. I shall give the summary here and show what happened as far as the total production of farm products was concerned.

In 1919 we had in cultivation 345,759,000 acres. The total value of farm products for that year was $13,820,000,000. In 1921 we had 348,059,000 acres in crops, and the product sold for $5,687,241,000, or a difference, if you please, in two years of $8,133,274,000. That was the loss that the farmer took as between the crop of 1919 and the crop of 1921.

The difference between the crop of 1919 and the crop of 1920 was $4,775,573,000, or in the two years there was a reduction in the price of farm products to the farmer of $12,908,847,000, or nearly enough to buy the railroads of the United States, and with the loss that he will take this year it will practically buy all the railroads in America, or pretty nearly half of all the railroads in the world.

I submit, Mr. President, that agriculture can not go on under those conditions. Everywhere, in every State of the Union, as far as that is concerned, where the soil has lost its fertility, farm abandonment is taking place; and it is perfectly safe to say that last year a million citizens—men, women, and children—left the American farms because under the present conditions they could no longer make a living there.

With these few remarks I am going to send to the desk and ask to have read—my throat will not let me continue—a report from the Michigan department of state, division of agriculture, as to the farm abandonments that are taking place there, and an extract from the Monthly Crop Reporter showing the abandonments that are taking place of Ohio farms, and those that have taken place of New York farms. In the case of the New York farms I have marked what I should like to have read. There are several statements here, but I will not ask to have them all read, but I ask to have them all printed in the RECORD. Some day I shall try to answer the Senator from Massachusetts more at length.

I ask to have these things read because I think there is a condition confronting the country that Senators ought to be well advised about, because the time is coming when we are not going to have any surplus, and we are not going to feed our own people unless we are willing to give the farmers of America a square deal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The number of men that have left the farms of Michigan during the past three years is three times as great as the number of Michigan men that died or were killed in the Civil War. It would require the present male population over 15 years of age of Lansing and Flint to replace them. There are enough vacant farmhouses in Michigan to conveniently house the population of Grand Rapids. The number of farmhouses vacated within the past 12 months could easily accommodate all of the people in the city of Jackson with homes.

Eight and seventy-four hundredths per cent of the farms of the State are wholly idle this year, an area of approximately 1,668,000 acres, equal to about five ordinary counties. The total men and boys over 15 years of age on the farms of the State is 230,000, or 82.5 acres to be worked by each man or boy.

These figures are based upon a complete survey made during the past four weeks by the Michigan Crop Reporting Service under the joint supervision of Mr. Coleman C. Vaughan, secretary of state, and Verne H. Church, field agent, United States Bureau of Crop Estimates, and aided by the office of the superintendent of public instruction. A blank was mailed to each rural school director asking for a report upon the farms of his school district. The compilation of these reports shows that 18,230 farms are idle this year, as compared with 11,831 last year, while the abandonment, which in many cases is temporary because of the lack of tenant farmers, is least in the best farming sections, it is found to be a community movement. Many districts show no abandonment, but where families began leaving the act seems to be contagious, until in some cases one-third or one-half of the school district had migrated to the city. In the south central district only 4.7 per cent of the farms are idle, and in some counties only 3 per cent. In the northwest district of the Lower Peninsula 19.4 per cent are idle, and occasional counties report 25 per cent or more.

This abandonment does not tell the whole story. A large percentage of men on farms are past 50 years of age and without help. The average size of farms is 91.5 acres, and there are but 11 men and boys to each 10 farms, or but 1 man or boy to each 82.5 acres, with many of these unable to do a full man's work. There are 30,300 vacant houses on farms, 10,000 of which have been vacated within the last year.

Of the 276,000 men on farms three years ago 46,000 have since left, 20,000 of them during the past year. This unprecedented exodus from farms indicates that city and industrial life have become more profitable and satisfactory than farm life. A recent preliminary survey conducted by the State farm bureau shows similar and comparable results, and that there would be a decrease of 15.8 per cent in the acreage of cultivated crops this year as a result. Its report also shows that the number of dairy cattle has decreased 11.3 per cent during the past year.

As Michigan is only typical of the conditions found in most of the other States, it is evident that the production of farm crops will decline as long as the present situation continues and as long as the cost of producing these crops follows so closely the price the farmer receives. With a steadily decreasing supply and increasing demand, the price of food will continue to advance.

The only remedy is a reversal of present conditions through an increase in the number of food producers and a corresponding decrease in the number of nonproducers of food. This reversal will only come when the remuneration for growing food crops becomes as great in proportion, taking into account investment, risk, and labor, as that of other occupations, and when farm life takes on attractiveness equal to that of city life.

ABANDONED FARMS AND LABOR MOVEMENT IN OHIO.

There was a net decrease of 60,000 in the number of men and boys over 15 years of age working on Ohio farms for the year ending in June this year, according to a survey made under the direction of Secretary of Agriculture N. E. Shaw, by W. F. Callander, agricultural statistician for the United States Bureau of Crop Estimates and the State bureau of agricultural statistics. The survey covered from 100 to 300 farms in every county in the State, selected at random. The report further shows that for every man who returned to farm life during the year seven left the farm for other employment. Based on the returns received it is estimated that there are now about 410,000 men and boys actually working on farms compared to 470,000 a year ago and approximately 500,000 three years ago. Of this number 70,000 were reported to be hired for wages this year, compared to nearly 100,000 a year ago, showing that about half of those who quit farming during the year were hired men.

The survey also shows an estimated total of 29,000 vacant habitable houses on farms this year compared to 18,000 a year previous. That part of the report covering the number of abandoned farms has not yet been tabulated. The investigation also shows that of the total number of farms in the State which changed hands last year 80 per cent were purchased by actual farmers who are living on them, while only 20 per cent were purchased for speculation or by men who purchased them to rent to others. The bulk of the farms sold were purchased by native Americans, except in the northeast counties, where the purchase of many farms by persons of foreign birth is reported.

LESS FOOD WILL BE PRODUCED.

POORER LANDS BEING ABANDONED.

The extent and importance of the movement away from the hill farms is shown by some of the letters received by Mr. Shepard. Thus a reporter in the Finger Lake region writes: "One must recall the time a few years ago when the farms on the hills were prosperous, well tilled, and occupied, but to-day all is changed. I counted about 20 unoccupied houses within a radius of a few miles, and many acres here in Schuyler County have been left untilled the past five years. Every year more people have left. During this past year every younger man who worked land or hired to some farmer has left to work in town. Along the State road conditions are different; there are no vacant places, as far as I see, from Watkins over to Dundee, and very little of the land would be for sale. Most of the people are older and manage in some way to get along, working what they can. There is a lot of the 'skimming' process going on, as when a farmer rents an adjoining farm, puts in just as little grain as possible, and cuts a large acreage of hay, most of which is removed from the farm. Two or three hay cars are being filled here this week."

A well-known Cortland County farmer, who has just gone to Colorado, wrote from there: "There are thousands of acres of hill farms in Cortland County that are practically abandoned. One sheep company rented as many as 2,000 acres in one body and there was as much more which they could have had last year. Some of the buildings on these farms are quite good and some very poor, depending mostly on the length of time without tenants. These farms have no sale, unless to a syndicate for some new deal like sheep or orchards or something which looks good but never pays. Sixty-five or seventy years ago there were 70 children who went to a district school near my farm. There is now not one family in the district and there are only two sets of farm buildings left. One farm which kept 35 cows up to 20 years ago has recently been sold for taxes."

FARMERS DISCOURAGED IN POORER SECTIONS.

The discouragement that exists among farmers in the less prosperous farming districts is well shown by their letters. A farmer in a stony clay section close to the St. Lawrence River was so discouraged that he wrote: "Conditions are getting worse every day on the farms. We can no longer get any good help. Lots of farmers are getting discouraged. One of my neighbors just sold his farm with good buildings, all complete, 210 acres, for $5,000. He is moving off, and no one going on. Unless we can get help on the farms, there will be a famine in this country within three years. I am going to try it just one more year."

Another farmer in a stony section of Jefferson County writes: "We have many new tenants around here this year. There have been 10 auctions within 4½ miles of where I live. There are other farmers that want to sell, and there is one farm still without a tenant. All of these farmers went to the city to get shorter hours and bigger pay. Eight young men from around here, ranging in age from 19 to 22, also have gone to the city. It is impossible for us to pay city wages, so you see what we are up against. We expect to raise what we want for ourselves, but I do not know how the other fellows are coming out. I am on a farm of 150 acres, with 10 cows, and I expect to work it alone. You know it can not be done right."

A discouraged man in a rather unproductive region just south of the Catskills wrote: "There appears to be great discontent among farmers around here. Some who have farmed all their lives want to sell. The grind is too much. There is very little help obtainable. What is available is poor and very high priced and does not seem to pay for itself. Everybody seems overworked and discouraged. There must be a change some way or other. If farmers are to continue they must get enough for their produce to pay the wages which will keep good men here. We like farming, but what in hell is the use?"

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it is rather difficult to be entirely patient while "farmers" who would not know a horse from a cow if the cow were dehorned tell us what is the matter with the farmer. Personally all of my sympathies are with farmer people, and as far as I know anything about my family for two or three hundred years they have all been farmers. Yet I hear a man like the Senator from Idaho, who speaks with "authority" for the farmer, upbraiding this side of the Chamber for its neglect of the interests of agriculture and commending the other side for its solicitous care of him. The Senator, who claims to be the president, self-elected, of the tariff bloc, whatever that is—nobody ever heard of it until the Senator gave out an interview assuring the country that certain interests were safe because he had taken charge of them—is content to write a tariff bill in which agriculture is to be protected to the extent of 21½ per cent, while the interests from whom the farmers must buy get protection of from 66⅔ per cent up to 300 per cent.

Mr. KING. On some items 600, and on some 1,100.

Mr. CARAWAY. And, according to the Senator from North Dakota and his joint showman from Indiana, the organ grinder, 15,000 per cent, and even when that was being discussed by the Senator from Alabama the Senator from Idaho said this 15,000 per cent—no, I believe it was only 1,300 that was being discussed—was not high enough for the manufacturer. He wanted to vote more profit to the man who sells to the farmer.

I do not know anything about the farmers in North Dakota, and I do not know anything about the farmers in Indiana, and I know nothing about those in Idaho, but if they are the kind of farmers we have in my country, when you say to the farmer "I am your friend; I believe in these duties," and unless you do believe that protection will protect him, then you are practicing a fraud on him when you write duties on his products in a tariff bill, and are content to write a tariff bill that will give the farmer 21½ per cent, but every man from whom he is compelled to buy will get from 66 to 300 per cent, and still call yourself the farmer's friend, out in my country that would bring something other than votes or words of commendation.

It is absolutely absurd. If you believe that a tariff duty will protect the farmer—and in some instances it will, and in some instances it will not—if you believe it will, and you are a friend of the farmer, and you, the president of the tariff bloc, whatever that is, the man who has the fixing of the rates for the farmers of this country, are satisfied to give them 21½ per cent, and complain because the people from whom they must buy get but 66 to 300 per cent only——

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. I have not anything to do with fixing the rates. The Finance Committee fixes the rates.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; but the Senator is too modest to-day——

Mr. GOODING. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that practically all the farmers' organizations, from nearly all the States of the Union, even in the Senator's own State, approve the rates we are asking. The Finance Committee has not given us a fair rate on rice yet. I think we will be able to give the farmers of your State and the South generally a fair rate on rice—a protective rate—as well as on peanuts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who is "we"?

Mr. GOODING. I hope——

Mr. CARAWAY. Wait just a moment. Who is "we"?

Mr. GOODING. I hope that with the help of some Democrats on the other side we will be able to give the southern farmers fair rates on their products, as well as the farmers of the West and the East.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is overmodest to-day. Have I not seen his interviews, or the interviews which are credited to him, about what the tariff bloc was going to do?

Mr. GOODING. I have not been boastful at all about what the tariff bloc was going to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator now is just overmodest. We have all understood about what he was going to do in the interest of agriculture.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I plead guilty to modesty.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is very observable. Is the Senator the chairman of the tariff bloc?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I think that is what they call me.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not know that was what they called the Senator, but I thought that was what he is.

Mr. GOODING. The Republican tariff bloc. I am very proud of some of the help we are going to get from the other side, however, and I want to say for my friend from Wyoming, who has been loyal and true all the way through in the interest of agriculture and live stock, I sincerely hope that when election comes his people in Wyoming will not forget him. That is the kind of a tariff man I am——

Mr. CARAWAY. That ought to do him some good.

Mr. GOODING. Not along party lines, either; I believe thoroughly in protection.

Mr. CARAWAY. That ought to do the Senator from Wyoming lots of good.

Mr. GOODING. I hope it will.

Mr. CARAWAY. But I did not see him smile.

Mr. GOODING. I am in hopes——

Mr. CARAWAY. I know it is the Senator's hope.

Mr. GOODING. That we may find more men from the South like our friend from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. He knows a good thing for his people when he sees it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure that anything over which the Senator raises his hand in approbation will thrive from that time on, although I saw neither of the Senators whom the Senator commended smile. One of them did wink at me, but I do not think that ought to go in the RECORD.

I am complaining of this, that there are certain products which you can protect—there is no question about that—and there are certain products you can not. I know—and I have done some farming—that what the farmer needs is a market. The Senator from Idaho does not think so. I know that farm products fell in price from the time we passed the emergency tariff; and I voted for that, because farmers were in a desperate condition, and I was willing to try anything which might bring relief. Farm products fell every month after we passed the emergency tariff until a $20,000,000 appropriation was made to buy grain for starving Russia.

I voted for that. I did it knowing that the real moving spirit of the people back of it was to lift the incubus off the grain producers of this country instead of feeding the starving Russians. I was willing to do it, however, because I thought they needed some help, and I thought the cause was also good, that the Russians needed the grain and ought to be fed. I did it notwithstanding the fact that the very people who proposed this $20,000,000 appropriation to lift the burden off of the grain producers of the Northwest had, led by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], killed the Norris bill, which would have given us a foreign market and would have cared for the cotton grower of the South equally with the corn and wheat grower of the Northwest. They killed that, and the cotton grower, of course, went into bankruptcy. I assume they intended that he should.

However, when the wheat and corn grower were going along with him, the very Senators who killed the Norris bill, and thereby destroyed the hope of the cotton grower, asked for an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury of $20,000,000, and I voted for it, because, while I may not be as good a tariff bloc Senator as is the Senator from Idaho, I have not yet reached that point where I am willing to destroy the farmer in the Northwest simply because his friends have seen fit to destroy those in my section.

We lost everything we had. All farmers lost. The Senator takes 1919 and 1921 as years to compare. In 1919 cotton sold at 40 cents a pound and up, some up to $1.25. Everybody had money. You could not have sold a negro anything but a Cadillac. Everybody had money then, and farm lands were selling at from $200 to $300 and $400 an acre.

In 1920, when our whole foreign trade was destroyed in an effort to elect Harding President of these United States, everybody in my country went into bankruptcy, and is there yet. Farm lands could not now be sold for a third of what they would have sold for in 1919, and in 1920 cotton, which would have sold for 40 cents in 1919, sold for 8 cents, and no kind of tariff could have prevented that. We know it and they know it.

The only thing that would have saved them from bankruptcy was something like the Norris bill, which would have given them a chance to ship and sell their surplus abroad. That relief was denied them, and now, on the products of those who can be protected in my section, the rates that were adopted in the emergency tariff bill have been cut.

I know that a tariff could protect the rice grower. I know there are certain other products it could protect. There are certain products it can not protect. It can not protect any product where any considerable amount of that product must find a market abroad. Everybody knows that except the Senator from Idaho.

You can not protect the wheat grower with a tariff if he must sell his wheat in the markets of the world, and the wheat grower knows it. You can not protect the corn grower of Kansas or Oklahoma or Ohio if he must sell his product abroad. We all know that. It is a market that he needs.

I only rose to express this feeling of—I will not say indignation, because I realize that the Senator from Idaho has been charged with a great trust, has been self-elected president of the tariff bloc, and is to write all the agricultural schedules, which the other Senators over there are to accept, but I feel a little resentful that that great self-elected spokesman for the agricultural interests of this country, who believes in his heart—and I say that because I am always willing to credit anybody with any belief that he professes to have—that by a tariff duty you could raise the prices of agricultural products to whatever level you saw fit, is content to give agriculture less than a third of what he demands for the manufacturer. If by a duty of 21½ cents you can pull up the prices of farm products, by making it 40 you could raise them higher, and you could still raise them by making the duty 50 or 60 or 75 or 100 per cent. He realizes that, because he complained so bitterly that the merchants were not given more than from 66 to 300 per cent, realizing that if they had 500 per cent they could make a bigger profit.

I resent, I say, that this man, who knows that by writing a higher rate he can raise the prices of the products, should be content to let the poor downtrodden farmer have only 21½ per cent while the merchant will possibly get 100 to 300 per cent, and the farmer must sell to the merchant and buy from the merchant. It is so infinitely unfair, it is so outrageously unfair, and yet the only man who has the power to write whatever rate of duty he wants in the bill for the farmer elects to be satisfied with a modest 21½ per cent for the farmer, whose interest he says he represents, while exacting from that farmer from 66 to 300 per cent in the interest of the manufacturers and the merchants and the profiteers of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 99, schedule 7, agricultural products and provisions, the committee proposes, in lines 6 and 7, after the word "cattle," to strike out "less than 2 years old, 1 cent per pound; 2 years old and over, 1½ cents per pound," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Weighing less than 1,050 pounds each, 1½ cents per pound; weighing 1,050 pounds each or more, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, one statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] ought not to go unanswered. He states that there was a serious depreciation in the total valuation of agricultural products in the year 1921. He said that the total value of agricultural products in 1920 was $9,054,000,000 and that in 1921 the value of agricultural products shrunk to $5,687,000,000.

On May 27, 1921, the emergency tariff law became effective. All of the crops of 1921 were harvested after May, 1921. Yet with the passage of the emergency tariff law, supposedly for the purpose of protecting the farmer, the total valuation of agricultural products shrunk nearly 50 per cent between 1920 and 1921. It seems to me that the figures given by the Senator show how inoperative the emergency tariff law was.

Mr. GOODING. If that is true, then there is nothing for the Senator to worry about as to taxing the American people. He should not worry about it if it did not increase prices at all and is not going to increase them. Let us get what revenue we can out of it. The Senator need not worry about the taxes he has been talking about all afternoon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has in his previous address referred to the fact that there is nothing to worry about in putting upon products a tariff duty which will not become effective. I consider the levying of tariff duties which do not become effective in increasing prices a sham, a fraud, a camouflage, and the worst kind of deception. In my opinion the whole trouble with the Senator's protective-tariff policy is that he considers protection something in the way of a special favor that a Government can give upon the asking, a kind of political patronage, if you please.

Mr. GOODING. I hope the Senator will quote me correctly. That was not my statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I know it was not the Senator's exact statement, but that was my interpretation of it.

Mr. GOODING. There is nothing about it for the Senator to worry over if it does not increase taxes. I did not say that it does not. I took the Senator at his own word.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator's theory of protection, as I get it from his whole argument, is that protection is a favor bestowed by government upon certain classes of people, that the manufacturers have had that favor all these years, that they have grown rich, that they have become prosperous, that protection has been a benefit to them, and that the farmer has not had this protection and therefore he has a right to come here and demand that this governmental favor be extended to him.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not yield to the Senator.

Mr. GOODING. I merely want to say to the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator believes, as I said, that protection is a favor, that protection is a gift, that protection is the bestowal of a privilege by the Government upon particular classes of people. Now, let us follow that theory a moment.

The Senator has referred to the fact that I come from Massachusetts, a State which has enjoyed protection, whose industries have been protected. The Senator is evidently not aware of the fact that there is more sentiment in America among manufacturers against the protective tariff than ever before, and that if it were not for the protection lavished upon raw materials the manufacturers of the country in large numbers would be here asking that their products be put upon the free list.

Mr. GOODING. Will the Senator allow me to answer that statement?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator be good enough to wait and allow me to make my argument?

Mr. GOODING. Let us be fair about it. That is an unreasonable statement to make when we put a high ad valorem duty of 35 per cent on wool and then put wool on the free list, and practically everything else the farmer produces on the free list, under the Underwood law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the principal industry of New England is the boot and shoe industry. What is the situation there? The boot and shoe manufacturers say, "We want no tariff on boots and shoes. We want no tariff on hides. We want no tariff on leather. But if you put a tariff on hides, if you put a tariff on leather, we must have a tariff on boots and shoes." The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] knows, and other Senators know, that the strongest indorsers of the Democratic theory of protective tariffs appearing before the Finance Committee were some of the largest manufacturers of the country. The position of the Steel Trust, in substance, was that "We have reached a position where we need no protection except the protection that must be given to us by reason of the fact that you are levying protective duties upon the products which go into the finished products that we manufacture."

That is one of the great changes that has taken place in America. Why has it taken place? Protection was invoked by the Republican Party—and there is something to be said for the theory—upon the theory that American industries were capable of making products that were needed in America, for which we should not any longer be dependent upon Europe, which could be produced here with a protective duty given to the manufacturer, a tariff duty which would equalize for him the difference in the cheap labor abroad and the high-priced labor here. Upon that principle the Republican Party has stood. Upon that principle you claim industries have grown up in the country. Many have grown beyond the age of infancy, so to speak, have become exporters, and realize now that the tariff protection is of no value and is of no real consequence, but simply leads to just such agitation as has taken place here this afternoon—leads to suspicion, distrust, and demands for protective duties that are not warranted or justified.

The Senator from Idaho evidently forgets fundamental principles when he talks about a protective tariff duty as he does. The protective tariff is a privilege; it is undemocratic. It only ought to be invoked by a government under most unusual circumstances and when it can be defended upon sound reasoning. It is wrong to penalize the people by demanding increased prices for the things they must buy.

A tariff, if it means anything, is a license, a privilege given by the government, sanctioned by the government, to command or to permit manufacturers or producers to exact higher prices for their goods. What has been the policy of this Government in so far as it invoked this unusual power, this undemocratic power, to levy duties and increased prices to the American consumer? It never has been invoked before unless these questions were asked: What is your production? What is the consumption by America of the product upon which you seek protective duties? Is your production less than the consumption? Are you meeting with difficulties in producing sufficient for the American consumption by reason of importations of comparable articles which sell at lower prices?

When those facts have been disclosed, when it was evident that an American industry which could in time take care of the consumption in America, when it was evident that that business was being destroyed or that the progress of that business was being checked by importations from foreign countries of goods made by cheap labor, then it was argued—and there can be something said in favor of such an argument—"We will levy a duty which will give you a chance to produce your commodity in America and sell it at a price equal to the cost of production abroad plus the duty that we will levy upon the imported goods that are comparable, and you no longer will have to compete with the cheap labor of Europe."

Upon that theory, upon that principle industries have grown in this country in many instances, but most of them have already reached the peak, they have already reached out beyond the demands of the home market. They are no longer selling solely and alone in the home market. They are selling abroad. They have gone beyond the need of the application of the protective principle which I have described. Never before, never anywhere, never at any time until the pending bill came into this Chamber did any Republican argue in favor of a tariff duty upon a product made in America which more than supplied the demand and which was being shipped out of the country in large quantities. It is a fraud, it is a fake, it is a sham to say that a tariff duty can affect a product made in this country in such large volume that it supplies the demand and is sold to the world, competing successfully with the cheap labor of all parts of the world. No tariff duties are necessary in such industries.

The one trouble with the Senator's position is that he does not care whether it is a going industry or an industry that does not supply the home market, or one that supplies the world. He said, "Give them a protective duty. It is a gift we have a right to have. It has made the manufacturers of Massachusetts prosperous." I will tell the Senator where I stand as a Senator from the State of Massachusetts. I will tell him that I never shall vote knowingly for a duty upon a manufactured or agricultural product produced in this country in such large volume that it more than supplies our demands and is being exported and sold in London, in Paris, and in the markets of the world as cheaply as it is being sold to the people of America.

I will tell the Senator further——

Mr. GOODING. Does the Senator say that as to the manufactured product also that is sold abroad?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator misunderstands me. I make no distinction. If the Senator had directed his argument to some of his colleagues who have confined their efforts to giving high protective duties to manufactured articles it might have had some pertinency; but I have never supported and have never believed in a protective tariff duty upon commodities which were not being threatened with foreign competition. I do not believe a policy can be justified which gives protection to products that can be as cheaply produced here as abroad. The trouble with the Senator's position is that he demands this extraordinary privilege, and says, "Never mind about how much you produce or how much you export; put protection on here, put it on there, and put it on there." He wants it on everything. No longer are we asked the fundamental question the correct answer to which alone can justify the application of the burden of tariff taxation upon the American people; for a tariff duty is a burden; it is a tax which is just as burdensome as is the income tax which our people pay or the taxes which are levied upon their property. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Idaho to misunderstand my position. I make no distinction between agricultural products and manufactured products.

If manufactured products are being made in this country in such quantities as to more than supply the demand, then they should have no protection. If agricultural products are being produced in this country in quantities more than are necessary to supply the domestic market, then there is no justification for protection for them. Only under those circumstances which I have stated can I conceive of a tariff duty ever being justified. In the framing of this bill all previous protective principles have been abandoned.

The pathetic part of the bill is the benefit which it will confer on the trusts. Never is a trust justified in getting a protective tariff duty. Even when this unusual privilege and power of imposing taxes to accord protection has been exercised in the past, the Republican Party has boasted that undue extortion upon the people would be prevented because the competitive character of our industries in America was such that one would be a check upon the other if prices were increased too high; but with the coming of the trusts, with the consolidation of the big business, with the control of the prices of many of our commodities in the hands of a few, a tariff is nothing more nor less than a license; than a permission granted with the sanction of the Government to increase the price to the high tariff level without competition and without check. Yet in this bill the trusts have been given this privilege.

The concern which produces 10 per cent of the consumption has been given protection; the concern which produces 99 per cent has been given it. No distinction has been made between an industry which is deserving and entitled to protection on the theory that it is a growing industry, the products of which America needs to have made here, and the industry which is not deserving. That is the fundamental mistake which I think the Senator from Idaho, with good intentions, is making, that he interprets protection as a gift that will operate wherever it is provided. He seems to assume that there are no fundamental principles behind the theory of protection; that it is a strong-arm method of raising prices which the agriculturists of the country have as much the right to have exercised in their behalf as have the manufacturers of the country.

The trouble with the agricultural schedule is that product after product is exported in large quantities. Twenty per cent of our agricultural production is exported from this country. What will be the effect of a tariff upon such a product? Either it will increase the price or it will not increase the price to the people at home here. If it does result in increasing prices it will make agricultural products so high that the countries of the world will refuse to buy from us, because they can go to Argentina, Australia, and to other parts of the world where agricultural products are being produced and exported.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho can demonstrate to me that there is an agricultural product that the American people need, that it is essential for our life and happiness, that it is not being produced here in sufficient quantity to take care of our demands, and that our market is being flooded with a comparable foreign product, then I will listen to his argument; then I will consider whether we ought not to apply the principle of protection.

Protection should be limited. You can not protect everything. There must be two guaranties to the people when the protective principle is exercised in behalf of an industry. There must be a guaranty that in the exercise of the protective principle those accorded protection will show themselves capable, in due time, of taking care of the demand; and, secondly, that they will take care of the demand at a reasonable price. The tariff duties that simply protect and permit ultimately extortionate prices never can be justified, never can be defended. I can not conceive of the committee abandoning the policies which they claim have made America great, and increased industry in this country, and protected the workingman. It has all gone; it is all abandoned, for protection is spread around here, there, everywhere. There is no scientific arrangement made; it is a mere guess as to whether rates shall be 5 per cent ad valorem or 50 per cent ad valorem.

The Republican Party needs no assistance from me; but I think it is making a very serious and a very grave mistake. To go before the farmers of the country and say to them, "These duties will operate to increase your prices, and you are going to benefit accordingly," in face of our experience under the emergency tariff law, is a mistake.

There are some agricultural products which protective duties will benefit. The Senator from California is interested in agricultural products in this bill, and the duty levied upon them is certain in most instances to be effective in increasing the prices, but they are agricultural products which the farmers themselves will have to buy in large quantities. However, when the time comes we will discuss that phase of the bill.

I repeat that the granting of protection to manufacturing industries, agricultural industries, or any other industries which are producing more than sufficient to supply the demand of our people is unjustifiable, indefensible, pernicious, and destructive of the liberties of a free people. It is an abuse of a privilege which ought to be sparingly used, for it is an unusual power; and the carrying of that power to extremes, the taxing of people beyond reasonable limits, has in the past led to the overthrow of many of the governments in the Old World. There is nothing which we should more carefully guard, nothing about which we ought to be more cautious, than the levying of taxation upon our people.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to get back to the particular item to be considered.

Mr. President, I am going to move several amendments to the first paragraph. I will announce them all at this time, and shall ask that they be later taken up for action in their order. Three of the motions are designed to restore to the paragraph the rates fixed by the House. The third motion will explain itself when I read it:

PARAGRAPH 701—FRESH MEATS AND CATTLE.

Mr. President, I move as an amendment to the Senate committee amendment to strike out the numeral "1½," line 8, page 99, and insert in place thereof "eight-tenths of 1 cent."

I move as an amendment to the Senate committee amendment to strike out the numeral "2," line 10, page 99, and insert in place thereof "1⅛ cents."

I move as an amendment to the Senate committee amendment to strike out the numeral "3½," line 10, page 99, and insert in place thereof "2 cents."

I move as an amendment to the Senate committee amendment, on page 99, line 10, after the word "pound," add the following: "Provided, That live cattle shall be free of duty when from countries or dependencies which give free entry to live cattle and meat products produced in the United States."

These amendments make cattle and beef rates relative.

The amendment to the paragraph proposed by the Senate committee is an increase in the rate as well as a change in the classification fixed in the House bill.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PARAGRAPH 701 OF THE SENATE BILL AND PREVIOUS LAWS.

Under the Underwood Tariff Act cattle and meats were free of duty.

The Payne-Aldrich rates were:

Cattle, if less than 1 year old, $2 per head; all other cattle valued at not more than $14 per head, $3.75 per head; if valued at more than $14 per head, 27 per cent ad valorem. Fresh beef or veal, 1½ cents per pound; tallow, one-half of 1 cent per pound; oleostearin, free.

The emergency act of 1921 fixed the duty on cattle at 30 per cent ad valorem and on fresh beef and veal 2 cents per pound.

It is to be noted that the Payne-Aldrich Act fixing the duty at 27 per cent ad valorem on the more valuable cattle, and the emergency act fixing the duty at 30 per cent ad valorem on all cattle, work out about the same as the specific duty on cattle fixed in this paragraph.

COMPARISON BETWEEN SENATE COMMITTEE AND HOUSE RATES ON CATTLE.

The Senate amendment changes the bracket from an age limit to a weight limit. Cattle weighing less than 1,050 pounds each are dutiable at 1½ cents per pound; cattle weighing 1,050 pounds each, or more, are dutiable at 2 cents per pound.

This amounts to an increase over the rate fixed in the House bill of an average of 1 cent per pound.

Under the Senate amendment a steer weighing 1,051 pounds will be taxed at $21; under the provision of the House bill a similar steer weighing 1,051 pounds would be taxed at about $13. The Senate amendment, therefore, increased the duty about 61½ per cent over the House rates.

FRESH BEEF AND VEAL.

The Senate committee amendment increased the rate fixed by the House bill from 2 cents per pound to 3½ cents per pound, or 75 per cent over the House rates.

RATES ON FRESH BEEF AND VEAL UNDER FORMER TARIFF LAWS.

The emergency tariff act fixed the duty on fresh beef and veal at 2 cents per pound—same as the House bill. Therefore the Senate amendment increases the rate 75 per cent over the rate in the emergency tariff.

The Underwood law placed fresh beef and veal on the free list.

Under the Payne-Aldrich Act fresh beef and veal were taxed at 1½ cents per pound. The rate therefore proposed by the Senate amendment is an increase of 133⅓ per cent over the Payne-Aldrich Act.

WHY THIS HIGH RATE ON FRESH BEEF AND VEAL?

Of course, the real reason is the attempt to placate the agricultural interests by giving them their share of protection. This high duty is of course based upon the theory that it will be reflected in increased prices to producers and the consumers and that the increased prices paid by the consumers will benefit the farmers in an advance in the price of cattle.

DIFFICULTIES WHICH THE STOCKMEN HAVE ENCOUNTERED.

Unquestionably heavy losses have been suffered by the cattle raisers, but their difficulties have been caused not by importations of fresh beef and veal but by acts of God, to wit, weather conditions and war. That the industry had prospered during the war is indicated by the rapid increase in the production and exports of beef. But recent years were marked by severe droughts, which compelled the stockmen to decrease their output and increase their cost of production. They also suffered from a general increase in the cost of feed, labor, and miscellaneous expenses due to war conditions.

Although prices of cattle, as well as other agricultural products, rapidly rose during the war, it is significant that costs rose proportionately, and the net gain questionable.

If the duties provided for agricultural products in this schedule are effective they will merely react upon the farmers in higher costs of labor and of manufactured products. If not effective the farmer is being deceived.

FROM THE FARMER'S STANDPOINT, WHAT WOULD BE THE EFFECT OF THE INCREASED DUTY ON THE PRICE WHICH HE WOULD RECEIVE FOR HIS CATTLE?

The American beef production is just now at a point where it just about supplies the domestic demand. At most the duty only secures to the domestic producers of beef a future monopoly of the home markets. The imports have been almost entirely in the form of live cattle from Canada. These have largely consisted of feeders and stockers, of which there is an increasing shortage because of conditions on the western range. It is the imports of live cattle from Canada which have chiefly permitted of pre-war exports of beef and veal.

Are these duties going to benefit the cattle raisers of the country?

They may benefit the cattle raisers until such time as domestic production overtakes domestic demand. The normal domestic demand is sometimes greater than domestic production.

The United States was on a net export basis in 1916 to 1919. In 1913, 1914, and 1915 the United States was on an import basis. Prior to that time we were on an export basis for 125 years. The fact that we no longer are great exporters of beef is because of the settlement in this country and the curtailment of the chief grazing lands. It is significant that the great decline in our production and exports occurred during 1907–1913, when the Payne-Aldrich rates were in force. While we were on a heavy export basis from 1903 to 1911 American hind quarters on the market sold for an average of 12⅜ cents per pound and Argentine hind quarters at 8¾ cents per pound. In other words, American beef commanded a price premium.

According to the Department of Agriculture (Yearbook, 1914), it was the rapid decline of the American exports which developed the Argentine industry.

During the war, particularly after April, 1917, refrigerator shipping was largely decreased in its effectiveness, and the nearness of North America to Europe enabled the same number of ships to take approximately eight times as much beef from North America to Europe as from Australia to Europe and about four times as much beef from North America to Europe as from Argentina to Europe.

The world demand for beef at the present time is greater than production. In the United States at the present time the domestic demand is almost equal to domestic production.

THE INCREASE OF PRICES OF BEEF AND VEAL TO THE CONSUMERS.

If the tariff duties fixed upon fresh beef and veal become effective, an enormous tax would be levied upon the consumers of these meats. From 1912 to 1916, average normal years, we produced in the United States 6,600,000,000 pounds of fresh beef and veal annually. An increased price of 3½ cents per pound on this production will amount to a tax upon the consumers of $231,000,000 annually. If these rates become effective, as it is the intention of those who urge them, the people of this country will have to pay annually in the future $231,000,000 in addition to the sum otherwise paid for fresh beef and veal.

PER CAPITA TAX BY REASON OF THE DUTY ON FRESH BEEF AND VEAL.

The average per capita consumption during the normal years 1912 to 1916 was 5 pounds of veal and about 60 pounds of beef. An additional tax of 3½ cents per pound upon this consumption means an increase of $2.27 to every person in this country. As the average family consists of five members this increased tariff duty means an increase of $11.35 to every American family.

In Massachusetts the tax on the people would be about $9,000,000.

If effective, the duties proposed in the pending bill will increase the prices of fresh meats and meat products to the consumers of the United States as follows:

Table showing the effect of the proposed tariff duties in increasing the price of beef and veal, mutton and lamb, pork, and pork products to consumers.

Commodity	Annual total price increase.	Annual price increase per capita.	Annual price increase, family of 5.
Beef and veal	$231,000,000	$2.27	$11.35
Mutton and lamb	31,500,000	.30	1.50
Pork (exclusive of lard); as about 50 per cent of pork products are hams, bacon, and shoulders, which bear a 2-cent per pound duty, this is conservatively stated at	105,000,000	1.08	5.40
Lard	12,000,000	.12	.60
Total	379,500,000	3.77	18.85

If duty is effective, Massachusetts consumers must pay increased prices for their fresh meats and meat products amounting to $15,140,000 annually.

The Massachusetts increased prices will be as follows:

Commodity.	Annua total price increase.	Annual price increase per capita.	Annual price increase, family of 5.
Beef and veal	$9,080,000	$2.27	$11.35
Mutton and lamb	1,260,000	.30	1.50
Pork (exclusive of lard)	4,320,000	1.08	5.40
Lard	480,000	.12	.60
Total	15,140,000	3.77	18.85

Mr. President, that is a pretty serious matter; that is a pretty serious bill—a third of a billion dollars for fresh meats. Who is going to get the benefit of it? We know one thing—that the packers are going to get some of the benefit, and we know that they are going to benefit very, very substantially, and you are going to meet the argument that you are taxing the consumers of America this enormous sum to go into the pockets of the packers of this country.

PACKERS FIX MEAT PRICES.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought the packers were establishing large packing houses in South America and that they would like to get that meat in as cheaply as possible. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the claim made by many people. The trouble, though, is that the meat produced and shipped to this country from South America is frozen meat, and frozen meat has not been able to get a very strong foothold in America as against the fresh meat or the chilled meat produced here.

Mr. PITTMAN. They are bringing in some of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There has been some of it brought in, yes; in small amounts.

Mr. PITTMAN. And if they had to pay a duty on it, it would be more difficult in the future, would it not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; it would.

Mr. PITTMAN. Consequently this duty in that particular can not help the packers, can it? I really would sincerely like to know how the Senator figures out that this duty will help the packers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose the Senator will agree with me that the 7,000,000,000 pounds of fresh beef that is sold in America is sold in large amounts through the packers.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose the Senator will agree with me that levying tariff duties increases prices.

Mr. PITTMAN. The packers fix the price of the meat entirely, but if the packer can get his meat from the outside he places that meat in competition with the meat produced on the inside, does he not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose that is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what I was getting at.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think he has found that the competition from the importation of fresh meats from Argentine has been serious. There has been no time, so far as I can gather from statistics here, when the importation has been at all serious. I think the importation one year was about one-half of 1 per cent. At a later time I will give the Senator the exact figures, but it has not been at all heavy. I think everybody must agree, however, that if these duties are effective the packers will get some of the benefit of the increased prices.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says that the importations of fresh meat from the Argentine have not been serious. I should like to ask him if he has any information as to whether such importations as have come from the Argentine have not been made by the packers, who, as I understand, have plants in that country?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I think the Senator's statement is correct, that such importations have come from the packers.

Mr. SIMMONS. The packers have been importing some of their meats from the Argentine.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Along the Atlantic seaboard, yes; but very little—very little.

Mr. SIMMONS. The packers buy most of the fresh meats of this country that are sold in large quantities?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The packers would probably use the fact that they had to pay a duty upon the imports from the Argentine as an excuse for increasing the price of their products to the American people; would they not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. President, I desire now to call attention to a newspaper article published in the New York Times in reference to the extent of the profits made by some of the packers, and to suggest to the Senate that there was not much need of increasing tariff duties that would be reflected in increased prices that the packers could charge the American consumers, or increased profits. The article which I am about to read was published in the New York Times on February 2, 1921, and is as follows:

BENEFIT TO THE PACKERS.

Quoting from a paragraph in the New York Times of February 2, 1921:

1,233 PER CENT DIVIDEND IN PACKERS' STOCK—MORRIS & CO.'S REPORT SHOWS UNANNOUNCED CAPITALIZING OF $37,000,000 SURPLUS.

The declaration of a stock dividend of 1,233 per cent is revealed in the annual report of Morris & Co., packers, made public to-day. The company has increased its capital stock from $3,000,000 to $40,000,000 by capitalizing $37,000,000 of surplus. The new stock consists of $27,000,000 common and $10,000,000 preferred, which is to pay 7 per cent annually and on which an initial dividend is expected to be paid within a few months.

The distribution of the new stock took place some time ago, but no announcement was made. The stockholders received 9 shares of new common and 3⅓ shares of preferred. The company is a closed corporation, all the stock except a few shares held by officers being owned by the heirs of Nelson Morris, founder of the business, and the estate of Edward Morris.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF BEEF AND VEAL.

Imports of beef and veal in 1914 were 200,000,000 pounds, and for the following years there was a very decided decrease. In 1918 we imported 23,000,000 pounds, valued at $4,000,000; in 1920 we imported 50,000,000 pounds, valued at $8,000,000; in 1921 we imported 30,000,000 pounds, valued at $4,000,000; less than one-half of 1 per cent.

We exported in 1914, 95,000,000 pounds, and during the following war years our exports rapidly increased until they reached the figures of years previous to 1914, when we exported three times as much beef as we imported.

In 1918 we exported 514,000,000 pounds, valued at $109,000,000; and in 1920 our exports again dropped to about the figures of 1914, namely, 90,000,000 or 95,000,000 pounds. In 1921 we exported only 52,000,000 pounds. Our exports in 1921 were about double our imports.

PRODUCTION.

We slaughter about 7,000,000,000 pounds of beef and veal per year, which just about equals our consumption.

Taking, for instance, the year 1921, our production was 7,000,000,000 pounds, our imports 30,000,000 pounds, and our exports 52,000,000 pounds. Imports of beef and veal did not equal one-half of 1 per cent of our production.

HISTORY OF EXPORTATION AND IMPORTATION OF BEEF.

Until 1907 the United States dominated the world trade in beef. It contributed fully one-half of the world's exports. In subsequent years our production rapidly decreased in the face of the increase in population, and despite the substantial tariff rates in force. The effect of the tariff was dwarfed by basic economic developments in the industry. It is noteworthy that prices steadily rose during this period, while the per capita consumption declined. This decline in production was due to many causes. One was the land situation in the West; another the lack of control of public range, homesteading, and the competition of other types of agriculture.

In 1913 this country first showed an import balance, which was greatly increased in 1914. In former years the United States always received some Mexican and Canadian cattle. During the war many more live cattle were imported. These cattle besides affording a market for the American crop of foodstuffs were in a considerable degree responsible for the exports of beef. In 1913 heavy imports of meat occurred for the first time.

During the war, when the shipping situation placed a premium upon American supplies, our production of beef increased and exports of dressed and cured beef rose beyond the levels existing during the period when our foreign trade in beef was heavy, although live cattle were virtually absent from our export trade.

In 1920, however, a reaction developed, and the American export trade in beef had virtually disappeared, while imports again showed an increased tendency. These imports, it should be noted, are largely in the form of live cattle.

So far as concerns actual beef and veal, the American product has a protection entirely apart from the tariff in the higher prices for American corn-fed beef and the prejudice against grass-fed Argentine beef cattle; most of the dressed beef exported has come from South America, as well as a prejudice against frozen beef; most of the beef exported from South American countries is frozen.

Certainly, Mr. President, a corporation which makes such enormous profits as disclosed in the article which I read a few minutes ago is not entitled to and does not need any protection from the American Congress. It is not entitled to any further license to increase the cost of fresh beef to the people of America. This financial record shows how they have profited, how they have expanded their fortunes, how they have enriched themselves through the prices they have demanded from the American consumers, and this chiefly and largely during a period of time when fresh beef was on the free list.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

PACKERS HAVE MADE 1,200 PER CENT.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If this corporation, and similar packers' corporations, can distribute a 1,200 per cent dividend from earnings made when there is no protective tariff duty, in Heaven's name how can we justify the levying of a protective tariff duty now?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator has called attention to the exact fact I was about to call attention to, that the product was on the free list, and the tariff had nothing to do with the profits. No concern could make 1,200 per cent unless they had an absolute monopoly of the trade, both in fixing the price of purchase and the price of sale, which we have always contended; that is, those of us who have been trying to control those institutions. But they are also now monopolizing the trade of South America, where they have cheaper labor than they have in this country, and broader ranges; where they pay no taxes; where they have enormous grants; and if they can make 1,200 per cent out of American cattle, they can make 5,000 per cent out of Argentine and other South American cattle. That must be perfectly apparent to the Senator.

The great trouble with the Senator is that he is like a western Republican. The western Republican is trying to bend Republicanism to his local conditions, and an eastern Democrat, where he finds they do not need any tariff on his manufacturing products, as the Senator has just said they do not need on the boots and shoes, ceases to stand even for a competitive tariff. He said awhile ago he favored a competitive tariff in some cases. In what cases? He favors a competitive tariff where the competition is going to run an industry out of business, I take it from what he said. But the raising of cattle and sheep is not the business of his people, and therefore he wants such products on the free list.

It is perfectly apparent what the situation is. If cattle and beef were raised in his State to-day he would find that it required a competitive tariff; they are not, and therefore he is making a strained argument and trying to tie up to this amendment a great monopoly in this country, which this side of the Chamber has been fighting for years, as the Senator knows. It is not fair to his colleagues on this side, no matter how good an argument it might be for him in the face of an election.

I never was a free trader.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator expect me, as a Democrat, to abandon the defense of the position of the Democratic members of the Finance Committee on these agricultural products?

WOULD CURB GREAT TRUSTS.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not ask the Senator to take this stand or any other stand. He has taken his stand as favoring a competitive tariff, exactly the position the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] took when he had charge of the tariff bill in the House. It is a position I take now. The Senator is not arguing, as far as the West is concerned, for a competitive tariff. He is arguing free trade for the West; that is all he is arguing. His whole argument is based on that. The Senator knows, and he has proven by his own argument, that the price of cattle and sheep and meat all through the West is absolutely fixed day by day by this great monopoly he has just described. He knows we have been fighting here to curb that monopoly, and have not been successful.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator say that the increase of the duty upon fresh beef will hurt the monopoly?

Mr. PITTMAN. It will do one thing; it will not allow these great monopolies, which are now organizing their business in cheap countries, to substitute that meat for the meat we are now buying. That is one thing. They can not drive us clear out of business, can they? That is what they are trying to do. Why do you suppose these great concerns have spent a billion dollars in South America to build up packing plants there if they have no market for the meat? Why do you suppose they are trying to introduce it into this country if it is not for the purpose of beating down the producer's price of meat in this country?

Would they not be in a better position to come to a cattle raiser in Montana and say, "I will give you $15 a head for your cattle, and if you do not give them to me for that I will bring beef in from Uruguay or Paraguay or I will bring it from Argentina." It puts a weapon in their hands when they have a supply outside of this country that they can threaten to use instead of the supply of this country, and they are using their intimidation just now. That is the trouble. The Senator is not arguing about his own hypothesis. He started out for a competitive duty; he is for a competitive duty for Massachusetts and he is for free trade in everything they raise outside of Massachusetts. It is a magnificent position in a campaign, but it is hardly consistent with the position he is now trying to maintain as a United States Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I supposed I was representing not only the views of the Democrats of Massachusetts but also the views of the Democrats of North Carolina, of Missouri, of Rhode Island, and the other Democratic members of the Finance Committee.

I want to say to the Senator that I think he misunderstood my argument if he thought I said I favored compensatory duties for the industries of Massachusetts. I favor tariff protective duties for every industry that is not producing a sufficient volume of the products to meet the American demand and is meeting with foreign competition that threatens the destruction of that industry. The distinction between the condition in the case of manufactured products and that relating to agricultural products is this: That there is more beef produced in America than the demand; and where there is more of the manufactured product produced in America than the demand, I am against a tariff. A tariff can only be justified, I claim and contend, when the production is beneath the demand and the extra demand is being filled with foreign competition which forces down the price of the commodity produced here in America below the cost of production.

It seems to me that the Senator does not make a distinction between the product that is supplied in larger quantity and exceeds our demand and those products that actively compete with foreign products. In the case of fresh beef the demand and the supply are practically the same. When the demand was less than the supply, in the years previous to 1914, we exported beef in very large amounts, and we are now in a situation where the supply is not sufficient for the demand, and where it will be necessary to import some beef if our supply does not increase; and when we begin to import, of course, these duties will certainly become effective.

Mr. PITTMAN. If these great packers, whom the Senator is condemning now, should be shown to own all of the available range meat supply of the world outside of the United States, and it should turn out that it was possible for them, by reason of these free ranges and cheap labor, to bring that meat into the great seaport cities, which are the great consumers of the United States, and absolutely destroy the profit in the raising of beef, would the Senator be in favor of a duty?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think under those circumstances I would favor a duty; but I have not yet been able to get any information that there has been any importation in large volume or that there is any threatened importation, and I do not think we ought to legislate upon what might happen in the future and what is not likely to happen in the future, in view of the information furnished us by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator does not know that these packers, whom the Senator from North Carolina stated were the chief importers, are increasing their business steadily, and increasing their importations. Does the Senator not know that that is a fact?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can not say to the Senator that the information I have available tends to prove that.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is a fact.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do say that experts inform me that the frozen beef from South America has been unpopular and has not received the demand that was expected for it; and that there is a very strong prejudice in the United States against beef from grass-fed cattle, because the American taste has been educated to beef from corn-fed cattle.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator realize that nearly all of the great meat supply of this country is in the interior, and that the railroad transportation is also a tremendous element in supplying these coast points with it, where it comes in competition with the foreign meat?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is on the Finance Committee. How many of the packers came before the Finance Committee asking for a duty on meats?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no evidence that any of them came in the open meetings.

Mr. PITTMAN. Was not that significant in itself? Yet the Senator tries to tie this amendment to the packers. That is what I say is unjust. The people who came before the Finance Committee to beg of them to sustain an industry that was rapidly dying were little stock raisers from all over this country, people who are fighting to the death with the very packers the Senator from Massachusetts is now so ably condemning, in which I join with him heartily.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think the Senator means to insinuate that I would knowingly defend any monopoly or trust on this floor. If my public service has meant anything, it has meant that I have been free from the taint of advocating the causes of the special interests.

Mr. PITTMAN. I most heartily agree with that. I meant no such thing. The Senator would not knowingly do anything to aid the packers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If I am arguing now a proposition which the Senator thinks would benefit the packers, it is through misinformation furnished me. I have no purpose in doing other than presenting the facts and ask that well-known tariff principles be applied to them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator know that the information before the Finance Committee showed that in 1920 there were 301,334,000 pounds of beef or beef cattle imported into the United States, a large part of it coming from Argentina?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator would wait until I finish my argument I would give him that information. Some of it I have already given.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator to say that he had no information of any large amount of beef or cattle being imported into this country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I said to the Senator that the amount of beef or cattle imported was trivial, was insignificant, and the figures 300,000,000, which he has just given, are insignificant, when it is reflected that the consumption in this country is 7,000,000,000 pounds. That is less than 5 per cent of the consumption, on the Senator's own figures, in the one year he selected.

The importations are less than 5 per cent, and yet he asks the American people to pay $375,000,000 more a year to keep out 5 per cent of fresh beef and cattle, or less than 5 per cent, that is being imported into this country, and the year the Senator quotes is an exceptional year. His figures include cattle—much of the cattle imported was feeder cattle for Canada, which farmers agree helps the industry as a whole. The facts are, Mr. President, that the importations of fresh beef have been less than 1 per cent in most of the years.

Mr. President, the record of imports and exports shows that up to the year 1912 we were producing in America very much more fresh beef than our consumers demanded. During the 10 or 15 years previous to that time we were doing a very heavy export business in fresh beef, but steadily our consumption was increasing, and in 1912 and 1913 we reached a situation where the consumption was practically the same as the production. The war came on and to meet the demands made for fresh beef by Europe the records show that there were importations from Canada of feeder cattle which enabled the American market to ship large quantities of fresh beef to Europe, and during the war years the exportation of fresh beef increased very materially. The price of beef also increased correspondingly, as we well know. Since the war there has been a gradual resumption of normal conditions. So that to-day the production is about the same as the demand, and there is comparatively little importation and comparatively little exportation though there has been some increase in exportation.

Now, so far as cattle are concerned, whatever importations we have had have been feeder cattle that have come in from Canada, which many of the agriculturists argue is helpful, because the feeder cattle are shipped out on the farms, and the agricultural products which the farmer raises are used in feeding the cattle and getting them ready for the market. That is the way that it has seemed to me, and if an amendment could be offered to the bill which would provide for interchange of Canadian cattle for our meat and beef, we would be serving both the consumers and the farmers of the country and rendering them great benefit. The coming in of a reasonable amount of feeder cattle would help to consume the feedstuffs of the West and the shipping of beef into Canada without a duty would help to create a market in Canada for our fresh beef.

I want to repeat that there has been and there is no serious threatened importation of cattle or fresh beef, and whatever importation we have had has not and can not be of any effect upon fixing the prices.

Mr. President, I do not think there is anything more I care to say upon this item. I believe that if the duty is effective it will exact an unreasonable amount from our people. If it is not effective, then it will serve no purpose, it will be of no benefit to the farmer, and will not bring about the end desired by those who advocate this exceedingly large duty, the largest duty ever levied, an increase of 75 per cent on fresh meats over even the high duties of the Payne-Aldrich and the emergency tariff laws.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee, which the Secretary will report.

The READING CLERK. On page 99, line 8, strike out "1½ cents" and insert "eight-tenths of 1 cent."

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail. Under the doctrine advocated by the Senator from Massachusetts we would have the American farmer competing with the cheap labor and cheap lands of Argentina and other South American countries. It is difficult to understand the logic of the Senator from Massachusetts. He seems to be alarmed about the tariff. In one breath the statement is made that the tariff will not give the farmer any benefit, and the next moment he is alarmed about the millions of dollars of increase in cost to the consumer on account of the duty which we propose to impose in protection of the cattle industry, the cattle raiser, and the farmer.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the farmer, the producer, receives a very small percentage of the price which is obtained for the finished product. For instance, I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that in 1912 beef was selling on the market at an average of $8.25 per 100 pounds and porterhouse steak was selling at the same time at an average price of 24 cents per pound. In 1921 beef brought approximately the same price, but the average selling price on the block for porterhouse steak was 50 cents a pound. This simply demonstrates that the price which the consumer is paying is not due to the price which is obtained by the producer, and that the tariff has nothing whatever to do with the exorbitant prices for which meats are being sold at retail over the butcher's block.

Mr. President, this is a very serious proposition. The question of stabilizing the live-stock industry of the country is a serious thing to the farmer. It is the medium through which the farmers are enabled to market their corn. The best market there is for the farmer is through fattened beef. I know of no other way for corn to be marketed. It benefits every farmer in the country. The tariff does not necessarily mean that the consumer will pay more for his beef. The tariff simply means that the industry will be stabilized.

Experience through the years when we had the Dingley tariff law showed that beef sold at lower prices to the consumer than it does to-day. A protective tariff will stabilize the industry. It will protect it from ruinous competition. That is the object of the tariff. It will tend to promote competition within the country. Live stock is produced by hundreds and thousands of farmers and ranchmen. There is no such thing as a trust or a control over the live-stock industry of the country. Live stock is produced by small farmers, small ranchmen, who raise from ten to one hundred or two or three hundred head, and now and then we may find some stock grower who may have two or three thousand head. But stock growing is participated in by the farmers all over the country, and there is no such thing as a trust or a control. Therefore, a protective duty is in aid of stabilizing the industry and protecting the industry against the threatened ruinous competition from other countries, such as New Zealand in the case of sheep, and Argentina in the case of cattle, and Mexico, when it is in a normal condition, which it is not at this time, in the case of both cattle and sheep.

Our experience with the tariff has proven beyond any question that the system not only stabilizes the industry and makes it more prosperous and creates home competition, but it proves beyond any question that it is the system which will permit an adequate supply in this country. For instance, under the Dingley tariff law our exports of beef were the highest we had had for 30 years. In 1900 we exported 606,000,000 pounds; in 1901, 734,000,000 pounds; in 1904, 770,000,000 pounds; in 1906, 764,000,000 pounds; in 1907, 614,000,000 pounds. The exports gradually dwindled after 1912 until our exports were nil or our imports exceeded our exports. Our exports under a protective policy of 27½ per cent, which is practically the same rate as that provided under the present proposed amendment of the committee, gave us net exports to other countries of an average of more than 600,000,000 pounds annually, while after the duty was taken off our exports dwindled until we have imported more beef than we have exported. At the same time the consumer was furnished with cheaper meats for his table than is the case to-day.

The matter is serious from another standpoint. There is great danger that our available supply of cattle in this country will be so depleted that we shall not be in a position to rely upon domestic production to supply domestic demands. The number of cattle since 1910 to the present time has decreased from 50,000,000 to 35,000,000 head. The situation is a very serious one. During the World War prices were unusually high, and labor was also unusually high; but suddenly the market became demoralized and, on account of the curtailment of credits, hundreds of thousands of young breeding stock, young heifers and young cows, were forced upon the market to liquidate existing indebtedness. That very greatly decreased the power of our cattle producers to furnish and fulfill the requirements of our domestic market.

Therefore we are not only threatened with ruinous competition but we are threatened with the destruction of the industry itself. If this industry is permitted to be destroyed, the American people will probably fare the same as people have been faring in other countries which depend entirely upon foreign nations for a supply of meat, and a large portion of our citizenship will probably be able to have meat but a part of the time. We may not only have meatless and wheatless days, as we had during the World War, but we shall have that as a permanent condition so far as meat is concerned. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment may be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment is, on page 99, line 10, to strike out "2" and to insert "1½."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is one other amendment to the committee amendment which I wish to have submitted to the Senate. I move, on page 99, line 10, after the word "pound," to insert the proviso which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 99, line 10, after the word "pound," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That live cattle shall be free of duty when from countries or dependencies which give free entry to live cattle and meat products produced in the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask some Senator who is a member of the Committee on Finance what has been the effect of the emergency tariff law imposing a duty of 30 per cent on cattle which has now been in effect for nearly 14 months? That duty was put on for the purpose of aiding the cattle industry just as this is proposed to be.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has had a wonderful effect in sustaining the price of cattle; but a report on the subject has just come up from the Tariff Commission which will be printed to-night—for I have asked that it be printed—and to-morrow the Senator from Nebraska will have the information for which he asks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We were told when the emergency tariff bill was presented some 14 months ago that the Committee on Finance was coming to the relief of the cattlemen of the country; that it was going to do something by way of a tariff which was going to increase the price of their cattle.

I wish now to call attention to the fact that cattle were selling in the Chicago market at $8 a 100 pounds at the time the bill was passed, and on the 1st of May of this year, about a year afterwards, they were selling for $8.60 a 100 pounds—a nominal increase of something less than 10 per cent—and that on June 26, yesterday, they were selling for $8.60, less than a 10 per cent advance in the price.

On the other hand, hogs were selling at $8 a 100 pounds, just as cattle were a year ago. No tariff was put on hogs, but the price of hogs has increased almost 30 per cent since that time. How can an advocate of a tariff on live stock of this character, which we export to other countries, look a farmer in the face and claim that a tariff is going to increase his prices when hogs have gone up nearly 30 per cent without any tariff, and cattle have not gone up even 10 per cent with the 30 per cent tariff?

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator from Nebraska knows that we do not import live hogs in any considerable amount.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know that the bill now before the Senate has put a tariff on hogs. If we do not import any hogs, why does this bill propose a tariff on hogs?

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator was referring to cattle——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now the Senator from New York is hedging.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator says we do not import hogs. Then, I ask him, why is a tariff proposed on hogs; and I ask him why hogs have advanced from natural causes nearly 30 per cent in a year and cattle, with this artificial assumed stimulus, have advanced less than 10 per cent? Is it not about time to admit that the price of articles which we import can not be advanced by putting a tariff on them?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I can furnish the Senator from Nebraska the information which he desires. I have a table here which gives the average prices of cattle for nine months previous to the passage of the emergency tariff act and the prices for the following nine months, and they show a constant and steady decline. On fat steers the percentage of decrease during the nine months following the emergency tariff law was 24; the amount of the decrease per 100 pounds was $2.83. On stocker cattle the percentage of decrease was 21 during the nine months following the enactment of the emergency tariff law as compared with the previous nine months, and the amount of decrease per 100 pounds was $1.47. On feeder cattle the percentage of decrease was 26, and the amount of the decrease per 100 pounds $2.14. On fresh beef the percentage of decrease in price was 20, and the amount of decrease $3.76 per 100 pounds.

THE EMERGENCY TARIFF AND THE FARMER—HAS IT HELPED HIM?

The emergency tariff law became operative May 28, 1921. The following table (information confirmed by the Agriculture Department) shows the average price of fat steers, stocker cattle, feeder cattle, and fresh beef in Chicago during the nine months previous to the adoption of the emergency act and the nine months following its adoption:

Table showing that farmers of the West received no benefit from emergency tariff on cattle and fresh beef.

(Per 100 pounds.)

Product.	September, 1920.	December, 1920.	March, 1921.	Average for 9 months, September, 1920, to May, 1921.	June, 1921.	September, 1921.	December, 1921.	Average for 9 months, June, 1921, to February, 1922.
Fat steers	$15.97	$11.94	$9.62	$11.55	$8.24	$8.59	$8.58	$8.72
Stocker cattle	8.28	6.23	7.34	6.92	5.80	5.34	5.27	5.45
Feeder cattle	9.81	7.69	8.22	8.24	6.77	6.04	5.72	6.12
Fresh beef	25.25	19.40	17.44	19.39	15.25	16.25	16.50	15.63

The following table shows the amount and percentage of decrease in cattle and fresh-meat prices after the passage of the emergency tariff law, presumed to be for the benefit of the farmers. In view of this table, how can it be argued that the emergency tariff law benefits the farmers?

Product.	Per cent of decrease.[1]	Amount of decrease.[2]
Fat steers[2]	24	$2.83
Stocker cattle[2]	21	1.47
Feeder cattle[2]	26	2.12
Fresh beef[2]	20	3.76

[1] Based on comparison prices for 9 months before and 9 months following emergency tariff law.
[2] Per 100 pounds.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I call attention to the fact that during the months immediately succeeding the emergency tariff meat generally declined 8 per cent? That is true as compared with the six months preceding, from January to June 1. Foreign meats went down 20 per cent during the same period; so that it shows that we upheld our prices within 8 per cent on a falling market while the foreign prices went down 20 per cent on a falling market.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that, in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate, the Tariff Commission has just made a report, which has not as yet been printed, which deals with all the articles covered by the emergency tariff act, why can not the agricultural schedule lie over until, say, day after to-morrow, so that we may read the report and learn what effect the various rates of the emergency tariff act have had?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will inquire if the report has been printed.

Mr. HARRISON. The report has just come in.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has been ordered printed to-day, but it has not actually been printed and is not now available.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not available, and I am not sure whether the order for printing it has been entered as yet.

Mr. McCUMBER. The moment the report came in I asked that it be printed and the order was then made.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the order for printing was made to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, when the report came in this morning.

Mr. ROBINSON. So that it will not be available before tomorrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Undoubtedly, it will be available to-morrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi is a very good one. We ought to have some little time to study the report.

Mr. McCUMBER. About all it will contain will be a résumé of the reports which we already have had in printed form from month to month. I do not think the report will be of any great value to us. I never objected to the resolution calling for it, as some one wanted the information; nevertheless, I think about all that report contains, other than, perhaps, some conclusions—the Tariff Commission is very much disinclined even to put their own conclusions to a report—are facts in a little more condensed form showing how the prices have ranged from a time prior to the emergency tariff act to a period subsequent to that time. Those facts we have in the monthly reports.

Mr. President, we have practically done nothing to-day, and it does seem to me as if we ought to complete page 99 and get through with it to-day and then take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that I have no desire to delay the consideration of this schedule, but the Senate thought it wise to ask for the report, and it has just come in. It will be of no use when we have considered and acted on the agricultural schedule. It would not delay the bill at all if the consideration of that schedule should be deferred until day after to-morrow. We can go on with some other schedule. I am sure that the information might be of benefit to some Senators if not to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that we can all get the same information contained in the report. We have been delayed, and have fixed upon to-day as the time to begin the consideration of the agricultural schedule. If we break away we will find to-morrow that Senators will ask that different items go over, as they are not prepared, while Senators generally have prepared themselves to go on with the agricultural schedule and dispose of it. I hope the Senator will not ask us to lay it aside.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator think that the report of the Tariff Commission will be printed to-night and be available to-morrow morning?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it ought to be, although I can not say absolutely. I think, however, that it will be.

Mr. HARRISON. It is quite voluminous.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think I ought to say that the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota appeals to me as a very reasonable one. I do not desire to delay the consideration of this schedule, and I think we ought to make some little progress now. The Senator has indicated his purpose to recess if the page now being considered can be disposed of, and I am in accord with that suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I agree with the Senafor from North Dakota that there is no reason why this schedule should be delayed on account of the report of the Tariff Commission. I think we are ready to go on with it, and I hope we will go on with it; but I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I have just had a conference with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is dealing with the paragraphs that the Senator wishes considered to-night. The Senator from Massachusetts tells me that he desires to discuss those schedules very briefly. His discussion will be exceedingly brief, but he desires an opportunity to discuss them.

Mr. McCUMBER To what paragraph does the Senator refer?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the paragraphs that the Senator desires to have acted upon to-night—the two paragraphs, I think, on the same page on which the paragraph we have just voted on is found.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one objection that I have to recessing in a case like this is that the next day we go over the same arguments that have already been made, and they are generally repetitions, and there is so much time lost. That was why I was so eager to make a little headway to-night; but if the Senator desires——

Mr. SIMMONS. I fully agree with what the Senator has said. We thought there would be no discussion of the next two paragraphs; but the Senator from Massachusetts desires to make some brief statements with reference to them, and I think we had better let them go over until to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES (S. DOC. NO. 225).

Mr. CUMMINS. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside of their districts, and for other purposes. I send the papers to the desk with the report. The conference report is not long, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, so that Members of the Senate may become familiar with it; for I intend some time to-morrow to ask for its consideration.

The conference report was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following number of district judges for the United States district courts in the districts specified in addition to those now authorized by law:

"For the district of Massachusetts, 2; for the eastern district of New York, 1; for the southern district of New York, 2; for the district of New Jersey, 1; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the western district of Pennsylvania, 1; for the northern district of Texas, 1; for the southern district of Florida, 1; for the eastern district of Michigan, 1; for the northern district of Ohio, 1; for the middle district of Tennessee, 1; for the northern district of Illinois, 1; for the eastern district of Illinois, 1; for the district of Minnesota, 1; for the eastern district of Missouri, 1; for the western district of Missouri, 1; for the eastern district of Oklahoma, 1; for the district of Montana, 1; for the northern district of California, 1; for the southern district of California, 1; for the district of New Mexico, 1; and for the district of Arizona, 1.

"A vacancy occurring, more than two years after the passage of this act, in the office of any district judge appointed pursuant to this act, except for the middle district of Tennessee, shall not be filled unless Congress shall so provide, and if an appointment is made to fill such a vacancy occurring within two years a vacancy thereafter occurring in said office shall not be filled unless Congress shall so provide: Provided, however, That in case a vacancy occurs in the district of New Mexico at any time after the passage of this act, there shall thereafter be but one judge for said district until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That from and after the appointment of a district judge for the middle district of Tennessee, the present district judge for the eastern and middle districts of said State shall cease to be a district judge for the middle district of Tennessee.

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Chief Justice of the United States, or in case of his disability, of one of the other justices of the Supreme Court, in order of their seniority, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and annually thereafter, to summon to a conference on the last Monday in September, at Washington, D. C., or at such other time and place in the United States as the Chief Justice, or, in case of his disability, any of said justices in order of their seniority, may designate, the senior circuit judge of each judicial circuit. If any senior circuit judge is unable to attend, the Chief Justice, or, in case of his disability, the justice of the Supreme Court calling said conference, may summon any other circuit or district judge in the judicial circuit whose senior circuit judge is unable to attend, that each circuit may be adequately represented at said conference. It shall be the duty of every judge thus summoned to attend said conference, and to remain throughout its proceedings, unless excused by the Chief Justice, and to advise as to the needs of his circuit and as to any matters in respect of which the administration of justice in the courts of the United States may be improved.

"The senior district judge of each United States district court, on or before the 1st day of August in each year, shall prepare and submit to the senior circuit judge of the judicial circuit in which said district is situated a report setting forth the condition of business in said district court, including the number and character of cases on the docket, the business in arrears, and cases disposed of, and such other facts pertinent to the business dispatched and pending as said district judge may deem proper, together with recommendations as to the need of additional judicial assistance for the disposal of business for the year ensuing. Said reports shall be laid before the conference herein provided by said senior circuit judge, or, in his absence, by the judge representing the circuit at the conference, together with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

"The Chief Justice, or, in his absence, the senior associate justice, shall be the presiding officer of the conference. Said conference shall make a comprehensive survey of the condition of business in the courts of the United States and prepare plans for assignment and transfer of judges to or from circuits or districts where the state of the docket or condition of business indicates the need therefor, and shall submit such suggestions to the various courts as may seem in the interest of uniformity and expedition of business.

"The Chief Justice and each justice or judge summoned and attending said conference shall be allowed his actual expenses of travel and his necessary expenses for subsistence, not to exceed $10 per day, which payments shall be made by the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the written certificate of the judge incurring such expenses, approved by the Chief Justice.

"SEC. 3. Section 13 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 13. Whenever any district judge, by reason of any disability or necessary absence from his district or the accumulation or urgency of business, is unable to perform speedily the work of his district, the senior circuit judge of that circuit, or in his absence the circuit justice thereof, may, if in his judgment the public interest requires, designate and assign any district judge of any district court within the same judicial circuit to act as district judge in such district and to discharge all the judicial duties of a judge thereof for such time as the business of the said district court may require. Whenever it is found impracticable to designate and assign another district judge within the same judicial circuit as above provided, and a certificate of the needs of any such district is presented by said senior circuit judge or said circuit justice to the Chief Justice of the United States, he, or in his absence the senior associate justice, may, if in his judgment the public interest so requires, designate and assign a district judge of an adjoining judicial circuit if practicable, or if not practicable, then of any judicial circuit, to perform the duties of district judge and hold a district court in any such district as above provided: Provided, however, That before any such designation or assignment is made the senior circuit judge of the circuit from which the designated or assigned judge is to be taken shall consent thereto. All designations and assignments made hereunder shall be filed in the office of the clerk and entered on the minutes of both the court from and to which a judge is designated and assigned.'

"SEC. 4. Section 15 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 15. Each district judge designated and assigned under the provisions of section 13 may hold separately and at the same time a district court in the district or territory to which such judge is designated and assigned and discharge all the judicial duties of the district or territorial judge therein.'

"SEC. 5. Section 18 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 18. The Chief Justice of the United States, or the circuit justice of any judicial circuit, or the senior circuit judge thereof, may, if the public interest requires, designate and assign any circuit judge of a judicial circuit to hold a district court within such circuit. The judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, or any of them, whenever the business of that court will permit, may, if in the judgment of the Chief Justice of the United States the public interest requires, be designated and assigned by him for service from time to time, and until he shall otherwise direct, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, when requested by the Chief Justice of either of said courts.

"'During the period of service of any judge designated and assigned under this act he shall have all the powers and rights and perform all the duties of a judge of the district, or a justice of the court, to which he has been assigned (excepting the power of appointment to a statutory position or of permanent designation of newspaper or depository of funds): Provided, however, That in case a trial has been entered upon before such period of service has expired and has not been concluded, the period of service shall be deemed to be extended until the trial has been concluded.

"'Any designated and assigned judge who has held court in another district than his own shall have power, notwithstanding his absence from such district and the expiration of the time limit in his designation, to decide all matters which have been submitted to him within such district, to decide motions for new trials, settle bills of exceptions, certify or authenticate narratives of testimony, or perform any other act required by law or the rules to be performed in order to prepare any case so tried by him for review in an appellate court; and his action thereon in writing filed with the clerk of the court where the trial or hearing was had shall be as valid as if such action had been taken by him within that district and within the period of his designation.'

"SEC. 6. Section 118 of the Judicial Code, as amended, is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 118. There shall be in the second, seventh, and eighth circuits, respectively, four circuit judges; and in each of the other circuits, three circuit judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. All circuit judges shall receive a salary of $8,500 a year each, payable monthly. Each circuit judge shall reside within his circuit, and when appointed shall be a resident of the circuit for which he is appointed. The circuit judges in each circuit shall be judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit, and it shall be the duty of each circuit judge in each circuit to sit as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit from time to time according to law: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any circuit judge holding district court or otherwise, as provided by other sections of the Judicial Code.'

"SEC. 7. All laws or parts thereof inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"An act for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the fourth judicial circuit, for the appointment of additional district judges for certain districts, providing for an annual conference of certain judges, and for other purposes."

And the Senate agree to the same.

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM G. M'ADOO.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, a brief address delivered by the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. William G. McAdoo, at Hutchinson, Kans., on May 24, 1922, dealing with general industrial and political conditions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[For address see Senate proceedings, Friday, June 2, 1922, pp. 7992–7995.]

CHARACTER OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Final Estimate of the Character of Abraham Lincoln," by B. B. Cahoon, sr., of Fredericktown, Mo., who knew President Lincoln personally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FINAL ESTIMATE OF THE CHARACTER OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

(By B. B. Cahoon, sr., of Fredericktown, Mo.)

[From the Farmington (Mo.) News, June 16, 1922.]

EDITOR'S NOTE.

Lincoln grows dearer and interest in what he said and did increases with time. Only a few are left who knew and came in contact with him. Hon. B. B. Cahoon, sr., of Fredericktown, Mo., is of them. Enlisting in 1861 at 15 as a Delaware Union soldier, wounded at Gettysburg battle, shortly after it he met Mr. Lincoln, who seeing his youth and his wound, inquired of him his name, age, parentage, residence, and how he so young had become a volunteer soldier. On being told, Mr. Lincoln asked how old he was when his mother died. "Five years," said the soldier. "Mine died," the President said, "when I was seven. I have missed her all my life. Never forget your mother. Always feel she is your guardian angel. When will you return to duty? Do you expect to outlive the war?" "As soon as I am well; I hope to survive the war," the boy replied. "I hope you will," said the President. "If you do, what do you intend to make of yourself? Where do you intend to live?" "A lawyer," the boy said, "and I want to live in the West." "That is right," replied Lincoln, "you will make a success of life. You have already won your spurs. But stick, study, work, and be true to yourself, and all will be well with you."

From that hour Lincoln became the boy's human and political idol as he still is. No one has read more of Lincoln and studied him closer than has Mr. Cahoon. Now, an old man, he, at 76, is an authority on Lincoln. The incident was characteristic of Abraham Lincoln. He took a sincere and habitually deep personal interest in every person he met and strove to aid them. Therein his deep humanity proclaimed itself. It is no wonder millions worship the great, good man and seek to pattern their lives after Abraham Lincoln's.

BY MR. CAHOON.

As all know of the poverty in which Lincoln was born, of his early hardships, of the death of his mother at 7, of his riding miles to get a preacher to preach her funeral sermon, of his good stepmother, Sarah Johnson, who encouraged the ambitious boy in every way, and said—though she had a son of her own—Abe was the best boy she ever knew, of his great athletic strength, holding firmly a heavy ax at length by its handle, of his peace-living disposition among rowdy Cleary Grove boys, but ready to fight if forced, of his failure and indebtedness as a young storekeeper, of his honesty as postmaster, of his quickly learning to be a successful surveyor, of his youthful captaincy in the Black Hawk war, of his sorrow on the death of his first sweetheart—Ann Rutledge, of his early election to the Legislature of Illinois, of his beginning to practice law at 26 in Springfield, of his obliging capacity, with his unvarying kindness, to always make friends who were always ready to and in fact did succor him; in short, as we all know the outlines of Lincoln's early career, we will not longer dwell thereon, but will seek to disclose his salient characteristics, seek an estimate of what made him the greatest and most beloved man of not alone the history of our country but the history of mankind; for Lincoln to-day stands next to Christ. In spite of his defective education, not over six months in school, and that he never was a great reader or deep book student, Lincoln saw clearer, thought out more concentratively for himself, every problem confronting him, than any man of his time. He sufficiently used books on the special occasions he needed them to strengthen the points he had reached. The fertility and originality of his mind was like John Marshall's. He required less research than other men needed. It is now recognized that for pure intellect Lincoln was the superior of any American of his time; he knew his mental power, knew that he had never met his intellectual master. In the end he thus impressed everybody, as he availed himself of the worth of every man he worked with.

He used selfish men to their capacity to aid the Union cause. He suppressed all egotism, covered it, perhaps cunningly, for he was very secretive, with a show of humility. His homeliness, awkwardness, and angular form were great aids in giving him greater fame and power in this: When aroused in speech his sweet smile was so beautiful and so softened his ordinarily dull and homely face, that its expressions became angelic; more, his smile revealed the tender soul of Lincoln. I saw several times the transformation of Lincoln by his smile. His was a wonderful self-restraint, in that he was without, or he kept concealed, personal resentments; he never lived on his hates or prejudices; he was self-reliant, paddled his own canoe; sought no aid except when running for office; worked out, alone, on his own theory, law cases without consulting his associates; therein he sometimes crossed their views and confounded them; he seized the strongest point in each case and let minor issues take care of themselves.

With justice on his side he was invincible in a lawsuit; in its absence he could not and did not fight, so tender were his convictions of right and wrong. Justly was he called "Honest Abe Lincoln." He never aided any pet or selfish schemes. He was patient in all things; had faith in the plain people and in their honesty and fairness; he strove long to educate them to his view; knew their mind, waited for it to consolidate before putting up to them public questions for final solution.

Though certainly ahead of most politicians, and apparently in advance of the majority, when he issued his proclamation of emancipation, he knew the people and bided his time until he saw they realized slavery was the real impediment to lasting union; that to get it they were ready to destroy slavery.

Reluctantly accepting the challenge of war, time and victory enabled Lincoln to do that. By invoking war, the devotees of slavery hastened a century its complete abolition. No man was more reviled than Lincoln; called meaner names and charged with more crimes, especially by the copperhead press, which favored the South. He refused to suppress it, saying that expression of adverse sentiment was the essence of liberty; that it was a corrective and confirmation of men in office, and exercising power, who erred; and that the best friends public men could have were critical enemies, who compelled them to deliberate carefully before acting and to reverse their error and resume their judgment.

He never hated men who differed from him; never said they "were without vision; were pigmy minded," and "ought to be hung with their heads downward—hellwards." He believed liberty to be the right of every man to enjoy all privileges and to think as freely and talk as candidly on all public questions as he did. In all his speeches and letters personalities are completely absent.

Lincoln sympathized with and helped all men, women, and children he knew, because he was a very kind-hearted, unselfish man. From backwoods to the White House, that trait made him very many unchangeable friends. He was never avaricious for money; only cared to make enough to live on, paying 10 per cent compound interest for years on early accumulated debts. Lincoln was never worth $20,000.

His sound sense, good judgment, patience, and profound interest in every individual he knew, and his tender merciful heart, were his strongest characteristics; the ones which to-day make him the most loved of all the Presidents.

He deeply felt the woes of all humanity; he believed in and lived Pope's "Universal Prayer"—

"Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me."

His tenderness to Confederate wounded soldier prisoners, as shown in his visit to the hospital at City Point, Va., the last week of his life, wherein he consoled and cheered them, and told them "They should live in peace again in the house of their fathers" was Christlike.

His sense of fairness and justice was never obscured. Witness Lincoln's last prepared message to Congress, advocating the payment by the United States Government for the slaves of the South. That was within a week after the Hampton Roads, Va., conference, six weeks before Lee's surrender, at which the Confederate commissioners, under the order of Jefferson Davis, rejected all terms of peace, except the unconditional recognition of the Confederate States. Lincoln's Cabinet was against that plan. Lincoln died with the fixed purpose of securing its enactment by Congress. Had he lived he would have secured it; he had never failed in securing a law he wished passed. Lincoln's good judgment and sound common sense were next to his humanity and mercy.

His humor and wit relieved his natural melancholy, which twice in his life, especially after the death of Ann Rutledge, drove him to the verge of insanity.

Never was Lincoln a demagogue; he never showed the slightest taint of demagoguery; yet he was at all times profoundly ambitious, always seeking office, never losing sight of his longing for office to publicly distinguish himself. But he relied on ideas and their advocacy to get distinction and to secure office. While always indifferent as to nonessentials, Lincoln was unbending in his devotion to principle; if he believed a thing was right and ought to be expressed, he uttered it though it cost him office. Witness his house divided against itself speech in his campaign against Douglass for the United States Senatorship, which gave the senatorial election to Douglass, but in the end, as did his Cooper Union speech, helped to make Lincoln President. The greater the responsibility imposed on Lincoln the more his reserve power enabled him to meet and surmount it.

The taint of sexual or financial scandal never touched Lincoln. The former is remarkable, because his wife's bad disposition often drove him from home. No man craved sympathy and loved appreciation more than Lincoln.

He believed in prayer, and often resorted to it for help; he believed in and relied on God. He sought the brotherhood of man.

The foregoing are the traits which make Lincoln our greatest national hero; which give to his name and character a prodigious influence for good not alone in our country but throughout the world. Exercising with moderation vast war powers conferred on him, he stands high compared with Alexander, Cæsar, and Napoleon, who were tyrants. It is unnecessary to determine which was the best or greatest man—Lincoln or Washington. It is sufficient to say that while in some respects they were unlike, in others they were alike; that perhaps the composite of their united characters are necessary to make the perfect man and ruler. As it is they will more inspire mankind for good to the most distant age than any other two men who ever lived. Short of Christ, the world has never had, and is not likely in the future to have, their equals. They immortalize our country.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have here a letter from Chairman Lasker, of the Shipping Board, making a statement with reference to conditions confronting shipping, together with a statement which he made before the Commerce Committee. I ask unanimous consent that these may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.
Washington, June 26, 1922.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The President in his message to the Congress has covered the need of a merchant marine as a national necessity for peace and for war. He has asked that during the recess of the House Members illumine their constituents on the administration's proposed bill for Government aid to shipping. In the hope that it will be of help to that end I take the liberty of inclosing herein a statement made by the writer before the joint committee of the House and Senate on the proposed bill for aid to shipping which fully covers, from the Shipping Board's point of view and experience, the Government's predicament in its ownership of ships, the status of world competition which America must meet, and the need of a merchant marine under our flag. The bill is also fully explained therein.

In considering the pending legislation it would seem to the writer that final determination need not be dependent on whether one feels that the United States needs a merchant marine, the fact is that the Shipping Board is to-day in possession of the greatest fleet the world has ever known and which by act of Congress it is mandated to operate on essential trade routes until such time as its vessels can be sold to private owners. That is the situation we are faced with.

The Shipping Board admits that it can not operate its fleet remotely as economically as private owners operate their vessels; the history of the prior boards show that they were unable to put the operation of the Government fleet on a proper business basis. The Shipping Board believes that the fleet under its charge can never be profitably or successfully operated under Government control because of the inherent and insurmountable handicaps incident to the Government ownership of ships. The reasons for these conclusions are elaborately covered in the statement inclosed.

Thus the question to be considered is, What shall we now do with this war inheritance? Shall it be sold to private ownership for operation under the American flag; shall it be sold abroad, possibly some day to rise and plague us; or shall it be junked and charged off to war cost as powder and shell were charged off?

The Shipping Board, approaching the problem as a business problem, believes that few Americans would advocate junking a fleet which cost the Nation vast sums of money. That alternative is dismissed as impracticable and impossible—impossible because such a course would admit to the world that the United States, possessed of a great fleet of merchant ships, was forced to concede that it lacked the ingenuity and ability to convert that fleet to a revenue-getting profitable asset comparable to the merchant fleets responsible for the commercial success of other great nations, and that the United States was bankrupt in statesmanship that visualized the need of keeping alive a merchant marine under its flag for peace and war protection.

The Shipping Board does not believe that the desirable units of America's fleet should be sold abroad, not only because such a course would end for decades any hope of establishing the American flag on the seas, but because it would place in the hands of our commercial rivals added tools to control world trade, would strengthen in certain ways the naval powers of other countries and weaken our own, and would allow citizens of other nations to select the cream of our tonnage at their own prices while the United States paid the great cost of upkeep of the inferior ships left on our hands.

The Shipping Board, composed of four Republicans and three Democrats, advised to-day by as competent a staff of experts as possibly any Government organization has ever brought together, averring unanimously that its efforts and the efforts of prior boards have proved that Government operation of ships is an utter impracticability, leaves us as an alternative the attempt to get the Government-owned ships into private hands for operation under private American control.

The administration has a bill now in Congress which the board believes will not only accomplish the establishment of a successfully privately owned American merchant marine but will accomplish it at an actual and substantial saving of money to the taxpayers by substituting profitable private ownership for Government operation that is and has been an unending and almost unmeasured drain on the overburdened taxpayer.

We must face the fact that the Government's fleet is costing $50,000,000 a year, exclusive of depreciation, insurance, and interest, to maintain, and that it can not be sold under existing conditions because in the last year, although the board has met world prices in its tonnage, of the 11,000,000 tons of which it finds itself possessed it has been able to sell only about 150,000 tons, after making every known effort to entice possible purchasers.

Let us have the courage to face the facts, whether the facts are to our liking or not. The fact is that under all sorts of conditions and all sorts of auspices Government operation of ships, by its history, admits its own impossibilities.

Bravely and patiently have we done our utmost to turn under Government control this war asset into a peace-time instrument; always, however, with the thought that through successful Government operation we would so establish lines that we could sell them to private owners. That is what the law under which the Shipping Board operates contemplates. But the very method we have chosen has defeated its purpose, for private operation is withering and dying under the blighting competition of unending drains from the Public Treasury. Wherefore let us proceed as would a merchant, unsuccessfully operating a business and overstocked with goods, to see how at one time he can turn the business over to those who might operate it more successfully and at the same time in liquidation add to the value of his assets.

The Shipping Board believes the great purposes before us can be accomplished through the agency of direct and indirect aids as proposed in the measure now before Congress known as the merchant marine act of 1922.

* * * * * * *

The Government came into possession of this vast fleet through war necessity. The fleet was built hurriedly, without regard to the costs of peace-time operation and without regard to the peculiar necessities of peace-time trade. The result is that we have many ships whose design and machinery will never permit of profitable commercial operation; we have far too many ships of some types, in some cases too many even of the right type; we have not nearly enough passenger ships, passenger-and-cargo ships, and refrigerator ships to constitute a balanced merchant marine for peace purposes or for naval uses in time of war.

There can be no thought of naval equality with Great Britain unless we have as many merchant ships of the proper types suitable for naval auxiliary use as has Great Britain. Fast passenger ships for raider and communication purposes, refrigerator ships to supply the combatant fleet, and airplane-carrying ships to scout for the fleet are almost as necessary to the operations of the Navy in time of war as are naval vessels themselves. In the most valuable types of ships for naval operations Great Britain already has approximately 250 to this country's 50, and when type and speed are considered Great Britain's advantage is even more overwhelming.

The war has changed the United States from a debtor to a creditor Nation. Our sea carrying before the war was almost entirely performed by the nations to whom we owed money. Those nations now owe us. They must try to utilize every advantage in the markets of the world in order to increase their prosperity, and we, with greatly increased productive capacity because of the war and facing overproduction in the future, must expand our foreign trade if we are to market our surpluses. Ships are as essential to foreign trade as are goods.

It is not to be supposed that those nations who will be our competitors for the trade of the world will always give us the ships we need when and as we need them. Regularity of sailing and promptness of service is the very life of foreign trade. Inability to market our surplus because of lack of ocean-carrying capacity will inevitably mean depression at home.

The farmer is vitally interested in the merchant marine in many ways. It is probable that the great carrying nations of the world, owing us large sums of money, may attempt, so far as they can, to buy their agricultural needs elsewhere. We must insure under our own flag such speed and prompt delivery to their shores of our agricultural products as will force them to buy from us.

While ocean freight rates were high immediately after the war they would have been higher but for the existence of the American merchant marine. If that merchant marine is permitted to die, a great toll in excessive ocean freight rates may be collected from us by the foreigner.

Unless we have ships of our own to insure our export trade the excess production of farm and mine and factory will constitute a surplus resulting in nonemployment in this country that can not but seriously affect the farmer's ability to market his product at profitable prices in the United States. Furthermore, the farmer's demand for adequate inland waterways, as evidenced in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Canal and Mississippi River deep-waterway projects, demonstrates the farmer's recognition of the importance of adequate water-carriage facilities to his needs. If and when these waterways are perfected, the best insurance of their continued use would be a merchant marine under the American flag.

The United States, once one of the proudest Nations on the sea, has had no merchant marine worthy of the name since the Civil War. The present Government-owned fleet offers the nucleus of a merchant marine commensurate with the position of the United States in the firmament of nations. Realizing the inefficiencies and great cost of Government operation; having demonstrated the impossibility of selling the ships to private American owners under existing conditions, and being well aware of the great differentials faced by American steamship operators as against the shipping men of other nations, the Shipping Board, a bipartisan organization, has unanimously and without political difference among its members recommended a policy of aids to shipping that has become the basis of the administration's proposal to Congress.

That proposal contemplates that should America ultimately get the 7,500,000 gross tons necessary to carry half of our overseas commerce the cost to the Treasury, directly and indirectly, would be something like $40,000,000 per annum. The 400 ships the Government is now operating at a cost of $50,000,000 a year would, under the proposed measure, draw but slightly more than $8,000,000 Government aid.

The administration's proposal limits the profits of any fleet receiving the benefits of Government aid to 10 per cent in any one year, each year standing by itself. There is no guaranty of profit. If a ship after receiving aid loses money that loss is the owner's. If it makes money, all over 10 per cent is divided; half going to the Government until all aid advanced to the vessel has been repaid. There can be no possibility of profiteering.

It is believed that the administration's measure will be a money-making proposition for the Treasury. If the bill is adopted and becomes law there will be more money in the Treasury at the end of a few years than would be in the Treasury if the bill is not adopted.

With sufficient Government aid, direct and indirect, to overcome the advantages which other nations have long enjoyed on the seas, private capital will it is confidently felt be attracted into shipping. The Treasury cost, in direct and indirect aids, the first year, if the bill passes, can not possibly be more than $15,000,000.

If at all successful, gradually (and it is hoped by the end of two and one-half years from the passage of the bill) the Government's $50,000,000 annual loss in operation through the Shipping Board will be wiped out. Under any conditions there would always be a substantial difference in favor of the Treasury between the maximum subsidy cost and the cost under Government operation.

The ships are wearing out and still America is impotent on the seas from a merchant marine point of view as compared with other nations. The fleet is bringing nothing into the Treasury and is costing large sums annually. If the ships are sold the proceeds will go into the Treasury to liquidate in some part their war-time cost. Thus the measure proposed by the administration should accomplish the liquidation of that part of the fleet serviceable under the American flag; it will end the drain on the Treasury resulting from Government operation; it will end the discouragement to private initiative resulting from that operation, and will stimulate Americans to take their proper places in the ocean-carrying competition of the world; it will insure the building of types of ships necessary not only to America's prosperity but to her preservation in time of need, and it will keep alive the art of shipbuilding in America, now threatened with extinction.

Respectfully,

A. D. LASKER.

WHAT ARE WE TO DO WITH OUR GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS?—DO WE NEED A MERCHANT MARINE FOR PEACE AND WAR?

[Statement by Albert D. Lasker, chairman United States Shipping Board, at the joint hearing before the Senate Committee on Commerce and the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries on the proposed bill providing aids for American shipping.]

Whether or no America is to be potent on the seas for the next several generations will be decided in the disposition by Congress of the legislation now proposed by the President for the aid and upbuilding of our merchant marine.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE.

The matter under consideration is not merely one of subsidy or no subsidy; it involves what shall become of the Government's vast war-built merchant fleet; what shall be done to end the large losses of governmental operation of ships through the Emergency Fleet Corporation; what shall be done to insure the overseas carriage of America's surplus products in times of peace; and it involves, in importance possibly beyond all these questions, whether America, through the possession of an adequate merchant marine, shall be self-sustaining and self-sufficient on the seas in times of war.

The question of subsidy to American ships has hardly ever been treated as a partisan one, in spite of the fact that we hear favorable consideration has been a Republican policy and opposition a Democratic one. The fact is that for practically half a century neither party has given life to a policy of direct aid to American ships. The Republican Central West has ever joined with the Democratic South in distaste and revulsion to subsidizing our shipping.

ISSUE NOT A PARTISAN ONE.

Times change; conditions change with changing times; and just as in a nonpartisan way subsidies have hitherto been denied, it is the feeling of the seven members of the Shipping Board that the question of Government aid to American ships, including subsidies, is an all-American one and should consciously be treated no more politically than should the needs of the Army, the Navy, or the Post Office Department.

Prior to the great World War, America was content to have its cargoes carried in foreign bottoms. We were then a debtor nation and we could feel sure that those whom we owed, being the great maritime nations of the world, would furnish us the bottoms with which to carry the goods to liquidate our debts.

CHANGES WROUGHT BY THE WORLD WAR.

The World War has changed practically every phase of human life. America emerges from that war holding first economic place in the world. She finds herself a creditor nation instead of a debtor nation; and whether we will it or no, we are now cast for continuing first place on the stage of world commerce. No nation ever held that proud position unless she was strong in her own rights on the seas. It is for us here and now to determine whether America shall attempt to refuse the place which destiny has carved out for her.

When Europe awoke that summer morning in 1914 to find herself enmeshed in a World War it was the beginning of a demand for American exports such as the wildest dreams of our greatest empire builders never visioned. That part of the world to whom the seas were still free centered its efforts to send its ships to our shores that they might be laden with the products of our factories, farms, and mines. We ourselves could make but a pitiful showing in the exportation of our own goods under our own flag. And were it not that the maximum production we could give did not even approximate the minimum of Europe's needs we should have been in a sorry plight; for had the war been lesser in area, and therefore the demands of combatants not required all the output we could supply, our great production would not have been used. We would not have had the ships to send our surplus wares to neutrals; and if one of the great maritime nations, say Britain, had been solely engaged in a smaller war confined to a narrower but distant area, her ships would have been diverted to her own uses.

COSTLY LESSON OF BOER WAR.

This is exemplified through the Boer War, where the conduct of operations was at a great distance from their base. Britain's ships were needed for the long carriage of men and supplies, though not in quantities remotely comparable to the World War. Thus, while Britain did not have pressing need for our production, she had such need of her own ships for the long haul that we were sorely pressed for carriage in our trade with her and other nations, as was evidenced by depression in many of our important commodities. Had we at that time had the expanded factory capacity we now have, the diversion of England's tonnage from our peace needs to her war needs would have been a calamity indeed. As it was, we all remember the serious effect this diversion of British tonnage had on the marketing of our farm products; it demonstrated that the farmer, even more than the manufacturer, was interested in America's controlling her own tonnage. Unfortunately, these lessons, because only transient, are soon forgotten.

THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1920.

Early in 1917 America entered the World War. Our allies stressed immediately that the winning of that war was impossible unless we could build ships, and more ships, and again more ships. The history of our shipbuilding program and its cost is too well known to Congress to need stressing. With the ending of the war, realizing our world trade needs, Congress passed the very beneficent merchant marine act of 1920, known as the Jones Act. The purpose of this legislation among other things was to provide for the temporary operation by the Government of such ships as were necessary to maintain and develop trade routes not covered by private enterprise and to enable the Government to dispose of its war-built tonnage to private owners. This act, wisely constructed with statesmanlike vision, has not achieved what was expected of it, because immediately after its passage world trading collapsed and has remained in a depressed state ever since.

The act was based on a series of sound indirect aids, the keystone of the structure being preferential tariffs to inure to goods imported in American bottoms. The aid of preferential tariffs has not been realized, for reasons well known to all, because of the declination of Presidents Wilson and Harding to abrogate those portions of numerous commercial treaties with foreign nations which forbade preferential treatment of our ships as against the ships of others, as contemplated by section 34 of the Jones Act.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION FATAL TO PRIVATE INITIATIVE.

Thus, we find ourselves to-day with the Government owning 1,442 steel ships aggregating 7,000,000 gross tons, operating 421 of these ships at an estimated cost to the Treasury the coming year of $50,000,000, with 1,021 ships tied up; we find private operations as well being conducted at startling losses, due not only to depressed world conditions but to the impossibility of the private owner maintaining himself in the face of continued Government competition.

The purpose of Government operation, as defined by law, was to build up trade routes in order that the Government ships might thus be sold with established good will to private owners. The very method chosen has worked to defeat its own purpose, for in the upbuilding of those routes the Government has operated ships, and in the operation of ships has driven its potential customers largely off the seas. Thus, we come to conclusions from which there can be no escape—that since continued Government operation means finally the possible and likely elimination of private operation of American ships a method must be devised whereby the Government shall end its operation and at the same time insure carriage of American goods under the American flag through private ownership as contemplated by the Jones Act.

MUST BE INDEPENDENT ON THE SEAS.

We no longer can be disinterested in whether or no we shall have an established American merchant marine. The transition from debtor nation to creditor nation has settled that; the changing needs of our people in imports and changing demands of others in exports all emphasize that we have no assured future of prosperity if we rely on other than ourselves to carry our overseas trade.

Europe owes us, governmentally and privately, some $15,000,000,000. To pay in gold is impossible; there is not that much gold in the world. The only way Europe can pay (to such extent as she may pay) will be in goods, either raw materials or manufactured or partly manufactured wares. In turn, we must find new markets, not only to absorb the surplus products which Europe formerly took from us, but to provide for the sale of many of the products which Europe shall send to us in settlement of her debt. These products, if in raw or partly manufactured state, will be brought to completed processes by American labor; but if permitted to flood our own market, and if we do not find a foreign sale for them, will so depress the price of wares at home as to threaten the prosperity of all of our workers.

These newer markets lie across the ocean—to the south in the Western Hemisphere, to the east in China and Siberia. It is the very need of trade in these markets that is the inspiration of the policy of the open door in the Far East, which means nothing more or less than free opportunity, based on merit, for exchange of wares.

SHIPS ESSENTIAL TO FOREIGN TRADE EXPANSION.

It is for these very markets that the nations of Europe which owe us vast sums of money will contend with us. And who can be so blind as not to see that Europe will very properly in her own interest find the way and means to refuse us ships when we need them most if that refusal spells her control of markets in which we would compete with her for mastery. It is well enough to say that she will not refuse us the ships if we can pay higher freights, but who supposes that foreign governments will not be sufficiently ingenious to work out plans to control their own ships to benefit their national trade and to our disadvantages even if by so doing they bring into their national treasuries possibly lesser freights than we would pay? If a ship in freight receipts could get only $25,000 in Europe and $35,000 here to carry a cargo to the same trade worth $1,000,000, the wise governments of Europe will find ways to equalize the loss in freight receipts to their own carriers; that their national treasuries may be enriched by the sale of the million-dollar cargoes rather than permit us to get those benefits, even though we would pay $10,000 more for the carriage.

AMERICA ONCE SUPREME ON SEAS.

In our early days we were a seafaring Nation. Our clipper ships excelled the world. With an undeveloped empire to exploit, the spirit of our youth, both from the standpoint of adventure and profit, responded to the inland call. Self-sufficient, self-contained, with abundant natural wealth to the point of waste, we became indifferent to the sea until shortly after the Civil War those nations who had the greatest need of the sea had so manipulated it that America became, other than coastwise, practically a nonmaritime Nation. The great World War brought about an increase in our production capacity that defied all preconceived ideas of expansion.

There can be no return to a pre-war basis. Increased overheads through increased capacities demand increased consumption in many lines beyond that which can be found in our home country. The debts Europe owes us, their enforced economy for decades to come, and consequently finally diminishing purchases from us, all combine to require our search for new markets. These markets will inure to us only when sureness of delivery, regularity of sailing, and promptness of service from our ports to theirs is guaranteed. Promptness and regularity are the very essence of foreign commerce. The greatest agents of our foreign commerce are ships of our own flag that must fight for cargoes from and to our shores to insure their profitable operation. The semideveloped countries of Europe, the newer countries which are not self-sufficient in their own rights, will be a fighting ground for trade. And here, too, only through control of our own ships can we be insured of steady markets.

FOREIGN TRADE NOW ESSENTIAL TO ENTIRE COUNTRY.

Aside from all this is our own change in domestic needs. Through our great prosperity we have become, compared to the other nations of the world, a luxury-loving Nation. Coffee, almost unknown as a regular beverage in most other countries, is a several times a day necessity at our national table. Three-quarters or more of all the automobiles in the world are run in America. Their tires alone require untold quantities of rubber. All these luxuries which we import must be paid for by exports, and we must insure that these exports shall reach their destination when and as needed.

The freights alone involved in our expanding commerce mount into the hundreds of millions, and it means much to our national wealth whether we retain these freights collectively to ourselves or whether we pay them abroad. If John Smith, the individual, spends $50 abroad and receives therefor wares, he is none the poorer; but if the national John Smith spends $50,000,000 abroad that he could retain at home, the Nation is a great portion of that $50,000,000 poorer.

FARMER VITALLY INTERESTED IN EXPORT TRADE.

The farmer has but recently seen what it means to him, in depression in price of his entire production, when exports fail and the surplus of his production backs up at home. We have but lately seen how our Government's expenditure of $20,000,000, plus twelve millions from the soviet government, for grains to starving Russia marked the beginning of an uprise in price of all our cereal products. From the very time that these purchases began the price of wheat and corn and oats rose. It is not contended that these purchases alone were responsible for the uprise, but they were one of the several factors that resulted in the farmers' depression being alleviated.

Had it not been for the Government's possession of its present steel fleet these export foods could not have been promptly transported, for there was not immediately available in commission adequate private tonnage. No one has a greater interest in an established American merchant marine than the farmer of our country, because it is in the sale of his surpluses abroad that his entire prosperity is involved. Europe, owing us vast sums, will undertake to make its purchases of surplus grains, when it can, in countries other than our own; and it is only through the control of our own deliveries, insuring that they be expeditious and constant, that we can hope to maintain prosperity for our agriculture.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT.

The farmers of our 18 chief agricultural States, with a total population of 40,000,000, are making a demand to which an affirmative response seems certain—that the ocean be brought nearer to them by the building of the St. Lawrence waterway, a conception that our Middle States will refuse to surrender until it becomes a reality. There can be no certainty of even a fair trial of that project after it is built unless we can have profitable operation of American ships, because the carriage in that waterway, which it is my ardent hope will soon be constructed, is but seasonable, and other nations might not afford to work out a system of flexibility of tonnage for use in that waterway to our advantage. Assured flexibility for use of that project must come from us and us alone. Therefore, when the farmers' dream of the St. Lawrence waterway comes true, as come true it will, it can have no assured life without an American merchant marine, and that merchant marine should be well established before the canal becomes a reality, that companies of sufficient strength may be alive to take advantage of its opening.

For all these reasons, therefore, in the changed condition of man and time, the economic need of our country demands an American merchant marine if we are to insure the prosperity of future generations on the farm, in the mine, and in the factory, which prosperity can only be insured through world markets for our surpluses—markets protected by American ships carrying American wares.

MERCHANT SHIPS ESSENTIAL AS NAVAL AUXILIARY.

We have lately seen the close of a great conference here in Washington whereby it is proposed to limit the burden of expenditure for naval armament on the sorely taxed peoples of the world. Our own America, the most prosperous of all the nations, is herself groaning under naval expense. It is because of a revulsion from increased naval armaments, as well as a cry for release from taxation, that the nations of the world agreed on a basis of limitation. Coupled with that are the treaties of the Far East involving the open door in China, which means free opportunity for trade in China. Nations build navies to insure that their merchant ships may carry their wares to all portions of the world unmolested. And so the limitations on our Navy and the open door in China, both integrally, are part of our national economic policies. Trade and trade alone are the factors that center world interest in the Far East. The naval needs are to protect that trade.

UNITED STATES NAVY ONCE IMPOTENT WITHOUT FOREIGN SHIP AID.

Having agreed to a naval program of 5–5–3, we can have no thought or hope of actual naval equality unless we can supply and bunker our Navy through our own merchant ships in time of war, should that unhappily come again. When President Roosevelt sent our Navy around the world, it had to be supplied and bunkered by foreign-flag ships. Our naval giant showed the nations of the world its feet of clay. In 1914, when the World War began, be it said to the shame of America, she possessed but 15 passenger ships of such type as to be of use for naval auxiliary, while Great Britain possessed over 200 such ships. To-day we possess 50 to Great Britain's 250. But when age and speed, which are the determining factors in the use of such ships for naval purposes, are considered, Great Britain's margin over us is further increased.

OUR DEFICIENCY IN CASE OF WAR.

Should we unhappily go to war with another country, Great Britain not being a party to the controversy because strict neutrality would be to her interest, we would find it difficult indeed to furnish our Navy with the supply and the fuel ships that it needs, in addition to the convertible type of merchant ship recognized as necessary for the second line of defense. For, while we possess a vast tonnage, that tonnage was built during the war in the best ways immediately possible, in order to get maximum production, but without regard to type or balance; so that while in millions of tons we have a formidable array, in the balancing of our tonnage for either war or peace-time purposes we are sorely deficient. There can be no thought of naval equality with Great Britain until we possess a merchant marine in balance and tonnage equal to hers as a second line of defense to our Navy and as a source of supply and fuel. It is idle to say that the 5–5–3 agreement brings us in proportionate naval equality with the other two nations involved, unless we do that which is necessary to build up a merchant marine of proportionate size and balance to theirs; for all naval authority in the world affirms that the supplemental merchant marine required by a navy is as essential to its operation as capital ships themselves.

FALLING SHORT OF ALLOTTED NAVAL RATIO.

There can be no thought of our maintaining even the naval tonnage allotted to us by the limitations agreement if we are to have no adequate auxiliary merchant marine. Great Britain has to-day that adequate merchant marine necessary for any operation of the naval tonnage that accrues to her in the Washington agreement. To the extent that we fail to supply ourselves with an adequate merchant marine of the type and number to balance the naval strength allotted to us in the Washington conference we should do away with the maintenance of capital naval ships. We can not fool ourselves; we only are on a 5–5–3 naval basis with Great Britain and Japan to the extent that we possess on a 5–5–3 basis merchant marine of the type and kind necessary for naval aid.

As it stands to-day Great Britain will immediately take her place both with naval and auxiliary merchant ships in the 5–5–3 program. We can not take ours to-day, nor for years to come. We still must create many essential types of merchant ships.

When we use Great Britain as an example we do so in the spirit of the greatest friendship, for, happily, no one can ever have a thought of war between the two greatest English-speaking nations; but rather we use her as an example, because Britain, in her attitude in the late conference, showed that she was as desirous as we that America should have naval equality with her, and she knows, better than we, that there can be no naval equality without the proper merchant marine.

PRESENT FLEET COSTLY WAR INHERITANCE.

We came into the possession of the vast fleet we own, built under the hysteria of war, for the carriage of supplies of our Army and the Navy stores. For the carriage of our men we had to rely chiefly on our allies and on seized enemy tonnage. We all realize now that this war-built tonnage, inadequate for peace or war, could have been built to serve a wider and surer purpose at infinitely less expense if created during times of peace. Shall we again be involved in such haste and loss by failing to learn the lesson which has just been taught us? Wherefore, whether we view it from the standpoint of peace or the needs of war, America must develop its merchant marine.

The Jones Act wisely provides, in its preamble, that its purpose is to develop a merchant marine as an aid to the Army and Navy in war and for the development of American trade in times of peace. We are not able to accomplish these purposes at the present time. Startling as it may seem, in spite of the vast tonnage we possess, we are not now positioned to protect our peace-time trade or to properly care for our Army and Navy in times of war.

Let us explore why this is so.

OUR PRESENT SITUATION.

We have touched on the lack of balance in our fleet. We will not speak of the vast number of tons of wooden ships; the sad story of this is known to all—they never should have been built; they were the war's greatest shipping blunder, an error against which we had been warned but which warning we refused to heed. They must be charged off practically as an entire loss, a monument to folly. They can not be used in profitable normal operation, and merely hang over the market as possible pirates in times of better days, depressing thereby the potential value of the steel fleet without offering the slightest hope of continuous operation even for short periods. The high cost of insurance, the uneconomic machinery, the great amount of fuel required in proportion to carrying capacity, make these ships in every way impossible. They should be considered as not existing.

DEFICIENCY IN HIGHER TYPES OF SHIPS.

The Government-owned steel fleet is divided as follows:

	Tons gross.
Passenger ships	500,000
Freighters	6,000,000
Tankers	550,000

Of the passenger ships 300,000 tons are ex-Germans, of which 140,000 tons are so old as to be of no potential continuing value; their life is but short, and they can be, by and large, only academically considered an asset. Of fast cargo ships, we have but 15 ships of a total of 116,000 gross tons.

In fact, in passenger tonnage, both governmental owned and privately owned, and including ships designed for the short runs to the West Indies, we have but 80 good ships, aggregating 600,000 tons, while of fast cargo ships of both classes we have but 53 ships of 390,000 tons.

To have a merchant marine that can effectively meet 50 per cent of all our peace-time carrying needs, we require a million and a quarter gross tons of passenger ships and about the same amount of the faster cargo ships.

SURPLUS OF SLOW FREIGHTERS.

Of our 6,000,000 tons of freighters, about half the steel tonnage is good tonnage, comparable to the best in the world. The other half ranges from fair to not usable for purposes and should be either sold abroad in such trades where we have every assurance it will not find itself in competition with our ships or dismantled. We must not fool ourselves. This tonnage was built during the war days from such means and in such ways as we had quickly at hand. The cry was for maximum tonnage regardless of its cost of construction or subsequent operation—for war knows nothing of economies—and thought was given only to quantity production for war purposes and not to the practicability and economy of operation of the ships in times of peace. Fairness compels the statement that, by and large, it would have been impossible to produce this quantity of tonnage had the measure of production been convertibility for peace-time needs.

HOPE TO GET TONNAGE INTO PRIVATE HANDS.

Of the 6,000,000 tons of freighters the Government possesses, it is the hope of the Shipping Board that ultimately a great measure of the 3,000,000 good tons will find itself in the hands of American owners, should the legislation here proposed be adopted. It is doubtful if, under the happiest conditions, the American flag will need the 3,000,000 good tons in its entirety, and ways and means must be found to dispose of such of the good tonnage as remains, so that American interests will not be hurt. Under no circumstances must the surplus of good tonnage that America can not absorb be disposed of so as to bankrupt those who buy from the Government at current prices.

THE MENACE OF THE SURPLUS.

Automatically the 3,000,000 poor tons must be done away with. Part of it can be used by selling to Americans the hulls at low figures for conversion to types of freighters of which we are not possessed. The balance may either be sold in small quantities in local trades abroad, where, because of shorter runs and cheaper labor, local operation may be possible, or it must largely be dismantled. For, if we permit a potential surplus to remain, with the possibility of its use in only abnormally prosperous times when any tonnage can be profitably operated, the burden of loss will fall on the good tonnage in times of adversity without full enjoyment of profits in time of prosperity, and thus we depress the price of all of our tonnage, and so it will come to pass that we shall liquidate the whole for less than we could liquidate the good part.

It is the unneeded surplus, in ships as in all else, that determines the market, and the same circumstances that forced some farmers to burn their corn last winter demands that, at least in so far as the uneconomical 3,000,000 tons of freighters go, we recognize that one of our problems is to force its disappearance from the market. If we are to induce private investment in American ships, it must be under an assurance as to what will be done with the surplus tonnage, plus an assurance that the Government will retire from operation, for private owners can not live and can not finance themselves with those two swords of Damocles hanging over their heads.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION EXPENSIVE AND UNSUCCESSFUL.

The Shipping Board, under mandate of the Jones Act to maintain necessary trade routes, is operating 421 ships at an annual loss of approximately $50,000,000. This includes the cost of lay-up, but not the cost of all necessary repairs, though the board is doing such repairs as it can within the figure named. There should be no quarrel at this expenditure of $50,000,000, because thereby we are keeping the American flag flying into all ports of the world, and the American manufacturer and producer is assured of carriage for his wares to his markets when his needs demand. For the year 1921, America carried under her own flag 51 per cent of her total foreign trade. This figure seems to indicate a result much more favorable than the real facts warrant.

If we deduct from our foreign water-borne trade that which is carried on the Great Lakes, in vessels which for the present are immured there, and if we subtract the cargoes carried between this country and the countries bordering on the Caribbean which have no merchant marines of their own and whose trade, therefore, is not competitive, there will remain the traffic in general cargo to overseas continents and nations having merchant fleets and competing with us for these particular cargoes.

OUR STANDING IN COMPETITIVE SEA CARRIAGE.

In this figure, which represents our real competitive trade, the American ship makes a poor showing. Our exports in this trade are now three and one-half times our imports. Of these exports, foreign ships carried over the entire year an average of 71 per cent, while the American ship carried but 29 per cent, and only reached this figure by virtue of the large amount of coal exported in American ships during the British coal strike.

For December, which represents a recent normal month, foreign ships carried 76 per cent of our overseas general cargoes and 24 per cent was left to be carried in American ships. This 24 per cent measured our success in competing against foreign nations for the carriage of our products to the markets of the world. Of the 24 per cent 19 per cent was carried in Shipping Board vessels and 5 per cent by private American owners.

MUST CARRY HALF OUR OWN OCEAN TRADE.

It must be the purpose and the aim of America—and the Shipping Board emphasizes its belief that this aim can be accomplished—to carry at least 50 per cent of our foreign trade, other than with contiguous and nearby countries, under the American flag privately operated. The suggestions made to the Congress by the President contemplate within a decade, at the cost estimated by him, that 50 per cent of such trade will be carried under the American flag privately operated. We are to-day carrying 87 per cent of our oil trade with Mexico and 57 per cent of the Caribbean trade in our own ships. But neither the needs of trade with Mexico nor the Caribbean calls for that type of ship which is the very backbone of the second line of defense of our Navy; nor does the trade with Mexico or the Caribbean call for that type of ship which is the forerunner of world trade and world intercourse—the fast passenger and combination passenger and cargo ships.

Of the 24 per cent of world carriage in American bottoms here referred to, it is appalling to think that 19 per cent is carried in Government-owned ships and only 5 per cent in privately owned ships, when it is considered that the Government, through the Shipping Board, admits its inability to operate on an equally efficient basis in competition with the private ships of the world. Fifty million dollars annually it is costing to keep the Shipping Board boats going—$50,000,000, not including, however, interest, full insurance, or depreciation on invested capital. For any private business to say that it was losing $50,000,000, without considering interest on capital investment, full insurance, or depreciation, would mean that the managers of that private business were attempting to deceive their stockholders by understatement. In the same way it is a deception to the American people to represent that the Shipping Board is losing but $50,000,000 per annum, when that $50,000,000 is lost in operations only and does not consider capital invested.

WHERE EMERGENCY FLEET HAS ALREADY PAID FOR ITSELF.

There was, however, good reason why the Government at the end of the war should through the Shipping Board have established governmental operation. Not only should there be no apology for this, the facts warranted it, and the time will come when it will prove to have been an act of courage and vision on the part of our people. But the continuance of this Government operation is now as unforgivable as its establishment was sound.

What do we mean by this seeming contradiction? When the World War was over there was a great scramble on the part of all the maritime nations to use their own tonnage for their own peace-time needs. Had America not possessed the tonnage she built during the war, in the two years of prosperity that followed the war we would have lost largely of markets that were ours, much as their need would have been for our wares, because there would not have been tonnage available to carry our goods. Those who needed them would have sent us their ships to the extent that they needed goods, but even then many would not have had enough ships to carry that which they alone needed, and others would not have furnished us their surplus ships for our trade aggrandizement at their own expense.

GOVERNMENT POSTWAR OPERATION NECESSARY.

The vast sums we saved to ourselves in freights alone, which through faulty governmental bookkeeping, was converted to construction charges, would have shown during that period that handsome freight returns inured to the Public Treasury. Private operation at that time would have been impossible; there had been but little overseas carriage under the American flag by private owners before the war, and private capital therefore would not have been available at the war's conclusion quickly enough to operate successfully the Government-owned ships, even had the Government sold those ships at fair prices to private owners. So that, in order that the war-built fleet might immediately come into America's peace-time needs, the Government was forced into operation—an operation that from that time to this, through the lack of private facilities, has been the greatest insurance we have to our future overseas prosperity, which involves our entire national prosperity.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION INHERENTLY VICIOUS.

We believe that the present operation by the Shipping Board is fast approaching as efficient an operation as government can give. But any free competition with the privately owned shipping of the world, through successful Government operation, the Shipping Board avers is an impossibility. The restrictions of congressional legislation, the demands of varying sections of the country, the limitations on free play, from which private business does not suffer, make it impossible for government-owned shipping to compete with the private ships of the world.

GOVERNMENT TAKES ALL CHANCES OF LOSS.

When the present board took office, June 12, 1921, it found the ships of the fleet being operated by managing agents, to wit, private operators who were paid fees ranging from 2½ per cent to 5 per cent of the gross receipts for supervising the operation of the ships. It must not be supposed that this commission by any means represented gross profits; in fact, practically all managing operators since the present board has been functioning have lost money. The managing operator had to pay out of his commission rent, clerk hire, expense of freight solicitation, superintendence of deck, engine, and victualing departments, and many other sundry expenses.

When the commissions were originally declared, freights were three or four times as high as they are now, so that in effect to-day the operator's commission has been reduced by 66⅔ to 75 per cent, even though his ships carry the same number of tons of cargo. To increase the commission would affect the situation very little, because the system in its very inception is uneconomic and vicious, for the reason that the managing operator, having no direct interest in the operation of the ship, having no direct responsibility, having no sense of building for himself for the future, is in such state of mind that he operates Government-owned ships with vastly different vision and inspiration than he would his own.

DEFECTS OF THE SYSTEM.

The system which we found in vogue when we came into office left itself open to all sorts of vagaries in management, to all kinds of chicane and unreliability. The managing operators had organized private stevedoring companies, private ship-chandlering companies, and similar devices by which to make hidden profits, to increase the meager compensation which the Government allowed them. The very spirit of making hidden profit on the part of an agent to a principal means a strained relationship all along the line. Such attitude and actions on the part of the managers were known to the captains and crews of the ships, who in turn felt neither pride nor proper responsibility in the trusteeship that was theirs. The facts were so notorious that to mention them is but to call attention to that which is obvious to everyone who has given the slightest study to the subject.

Let it not be felt by this seemingly black statement that we wish to reflect on the integrity of the operators as a whole. But few of them we believe have consciously done wrong. The very small commission allowed them made it necessary for them to find other sources of profit out of the responsibility that is theirs. These sources of profit came into life so gradually that they failed to be noticed, and the new board claims no great credit that when it came into office it was able to visualize the whole picture because it saw the picture complete.

AN IMPOSSIBLE PROCEDURE.

Nor can the individual agent be chargeable with the fact that initiative and sense of responsibility are lacking in the transaction. It would be impossible. It is not within human realm to create in such a transaction a sense of initiative and responsibility. The only reason that the managing operator continues in his connection with the board—and I think I speak the view of the managing operator that he believes as little in the system as anyone—is that he hopes by cooperating with the board in the management of the ships to keep alive America's merchant marine until Congress can adopt a national policy that will insure its life. The managing operator, strange as it may seem with the charges that are made against the system, is by and large performining a really helpful service.

PAST ABUSES CORRECTED BY PRESENT BOARD.

The present board when it took office, cognizant in a lay way of the situation, which, indeed, was promptly brought to its attention by the prior chairman, took steps to right the condition in so far as possible. We believe we have built up an organization in the Emergency Fleet Corporation that is measurable to any private organization in the world, but, for reasons which will develop, that organization is discouraged by the impossibility of creating any proper operation through Government ownership. The new board and the trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation set to work early last summer to correct the evils which have here been enumerated, and we stand firm in the statement that these evils have been eliminated, in so far as time and knowledge and effort and limited organization, due to needs of keeping within appropriations, have permitted. I feel I can state without fear of contradiction that the improvement made since last June in the operations of the board's fleet command the admiration of shipowners of the world throughout.

LIMITATIONS OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

But let us not be deceived. Conditions still are bad and will ever remain so under Government ownership because of the impossibility of competing with private operation. Both the sense of initiative and the responsibility found in private operations are lacking. Initiative is lacking, because neither those employed by the Fleet Corporation nor the managing agents, nor their employees in turn, have the slightest notion that they are building up anything permanent for themselves. At any time Congress may see fit to so reduce salaries that men of ability can no longer afford to stay with the Fleet Corporation. In other departments of the Government it is considered somewhat of an honor to hold office; to be connected with the Shipping Board, in the words of Congress, as often expressed on the floor of both Houses, is a sort of semi-disgrace. Small wonder, then, that it is exceedingly difficult to keep up that inspiration which is necessary for sure and permanent accomplishment.

HANDICAPPED BY GOVERNMENTAL RESTRICTIONS.

There is no privately owned corporation doing an infinite fraction of the volume of work of the Fleet Corporation that does not have more high-salaried men than is permitted to the Fleet Corporation. Men will not serve the Fleet Corporation for honor alone, for there is little or no honor to be found there in public recognition. The few high-salaried men we have are, however, making actual sacrifices in order to aid the situation, as evidenced in testimony given before the House Appropriations Committee but lately. Inspiration is further lacking because necessarily, in a Government-owned fleet, the influences of selfish interests and localities which desire special privileges can not at all times be resisted, and should surrender be made to such situations, inspiration would be compromised with.

GOVERNMENT CAN NOT COMPETE ON SEAS ON EQUAL BASIS.

There are many things necessary to successful ship operation in which the Government can not engage. For instance, often it becomes necessary to buy and sell merchandise in order to insure cargoes. The most successful fleets under the American flag are those of the United Fruit Co., the United States Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and the Standard and other oil companies. The owners of these fleets are engaged in trading and thus insure full tonnage. No Government operation can do this. The Shipping Board at the present time is negotiating for the sale of several ships to a concern which in turn is negotiating with the Chilean Government, whereby the American concern sells the Chilean Government 300,000 to 600,000 tons of coal a year for a term of years, during which time it takes 300,000 to 600,000 tons of nitrates in exchange. Thus those ships are assured of cargo through trading connections.

I do not enter into a discussion of the merit of private ownership against that of public ownership in anything save ships. In the Post Office, in the Army, in the Navy, Government ownership can prevail, because a monopoly is created. Should the Government desire to take over the railroads, it could create a monopoly which would give exclusive privilege to Government operation until such time as efficiency might be brought into life; but shipping is a different thing. The Government must ever be in free competition with privately owned shipping of the world. No monopoly can be created during the existence of which efficiency can be brought to life, and in the competition between Government ownership on the part of our Nation, and the initiative and sense of responsibility concomitant with private ownership in others, failure is foredoomed.

RISK OF GOVERNMENT COMPETITION TOO GREAT FOR CHARTER METHOD.

The new board, recognizing the viciousness of the managing agency system adopted, as one of its earliest policies, that of placing the ships on a bare-boat charter basis, if sale was impossible. Bare-boat charter means to rent the ship for use to private operators, the private operators bearing all expenses of manning, fueling, victualing, stevedoring, and repairs. The owner merely rents the use of the bare ship and supplies hull insurance. The charterer bears all the losses of the operation and to him all the profits accrue; and hence there is, by and large a measure of incentive such as is found in private ownership.

In spite of all efforts on the part of the board to charter ships under such a plan, the net result has been the chartering of but 38 ships at the small compensation of 50 cents per ton per month, an amount just about sufficient to offset insurance, interest, and depreciation, if the ship were privately owned, without leaving any profit to the owners in the transaction. The interest, insurance, and depreciation, here estimated, is based on world prices of merely $30 per ton.

FORCED INTO INCONSISTENT POSITION.

The fact that the board was not able to carry out its policy of going on a bareboat charter basis is due to the fact that it has been impossible to bareboat charter the ships. Under the merchant marine act of 1920, it being obligatory on the Shipping Board to maintain certain routes, the board has been forced to continue in a system of which economically it does not approve; the board has reduced its operations to 421 ships in order to keep within the meaning of its interpretation of the Jones Act. It has, in so far as time has permitted, corrected the abuses in the managing agency system complained of, but the inherent lack of inspiration and lack of responsibility can never be cured under this system.

With world shipping depressed beyond anything ever known, with the fear of competitive Government operation financed out of the depths of the Public Treasury, with the bugaboo of a vast unliquidated Government-owned tonnage hanging over the market, charterer and buyer alike find no incentive for risk. It is a drab picture which I draw, but I aver that we can only look forward to benefiting from the advantages of improved world trade conditions when they may come by now putting our house in order to transfer our operations and our fleet into private hands.

DIRECT GOVERNMENT OPERATION EVEN WORSE.

The only other alternative is worse than the present dire situation; that is, direct operation by the Government instead of through managing agents. If there is one thing worse than Government ownership, as we now have it, it is ownership and operation by the Government. The reason for this is obvious. If we find it difficult to create an organization for the Government merely to supervise the operation of private agents, how difficult and impossible would it be to set up a proper operation for so complex a business as shipping, to be operated throughout every corner of the world.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION MEANS EVENTUAL DISAPPEARANCE OF FLEET.

One of the most formidable objections to continued Government operation to-day—an objection that is insurmountable—is that the ships owned by the Government would in due course wear out, even with proper repairs. No one in Congress suggests, nor have I ever heard it suggested from any source, that the Government should build ships to replace those that are worn out, or that the Government should build new type ships. If there is one unanimous opinion in the country regarding our merchant marine it is that Government construction of merchant ships should cease. Thus the continued operation by the Government of its present fleet would be making no progress toward a permanent policy on the seas or a renewed and enduring merchant marine. This one phase alone calls for legislation along the lines proposed to insure the Government's retirement from ownership and operation.

Permit me to stress that unless the Government rebuilds, even if the Government could stay in operation and give a good operation, which I deny, within less than 20 years the fleet would be worn out and gone. We would be building up no American merchant marine, for, with the Government continuing to operate, private operators would be driven out of business under the American flag. They could not stand the competition. The Government would not be building new ships, and all that would have been accomplished would be declining Governmental operations under the American flag, with the assurance that the ultimate would be America driven from the seas. Thus the Americans who took to the sea as a profession would ultimately find America without ships of its own flag, and would be driven to ship on foreign ships at foreign wages; whereas by insuring private operations, which will be continuing, we insure American seamen on the sea at American wages. Further, if the Government continues in operation without the legislation asked for, and drives the private owner off the sea or prevents his growth and assuredly prevents new capital from coming into existence, there will be no building by the Government, or anyone else under the American flag, of those types of ships so sorely needed to balance our fleet and to aid our Navy in time of war.

Continued Government operation is a solution only from one standpoint. It solves the problem in one way, to wit, that the fleet shall be operated by the Government until it is worn out and thus assure the elimination of the American flag from world commerce.

GOVERNMENT AID ESSENTIAL TO END LOSSES.

I do not desire by compromise for one moment to escape the responsibility of making the assertion that there is no future for the American merchant marine, private and Government, save bankruptcy, unless private ownership is fostered and expanded and the Government retire. No philosophy of sophistry, no economic theories can change the proved facts of experience of the Shipping Board. Those of us who spend our hours in the Shipping Board claim to be as patriotically moved as any men on this subject. Our contact with this thing is closer than that of others, and I am sure the members of the Shipping Board will join with the trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation in attesting that I truly record here our experience.

While the seeming loss of Government operation at this time is $4,000,000 a month, let us remember that the fleet is growing no younger. Each day adds age to it, and if these operations be not quickly ended, the ships, through the lack of responsibility felt regarding them on the part of the operators and crew alike, will depreciate largely in worth.

LOSS BY DETERIORATION.

With the way the ships are handled under the present lack of responsibility, as will be proved to you in testimony later to be given by Shipping Board experts, regardless of how world conditions improve and freights increase, the loss of the Shipping Board will be constant and possibly accelerated through the vast repairs to the ships that will be necessary as time goes on.

We are living in a fool's paradise if we think the loss is merely that which we can measure in the monthly balance sheet; and even this loss of $50,000,000 per annum fails to take proper account of interest, depreciation, or full insurance.

How can private enterprise live in such competition? To continue it spells the death of private enterprise and in turn Government operation will wither. We can no longer procrastinate in choosing our course. Congress must now decide whether there shall be opportunity given to turn this thing into a great asset of peace and an essential of war—as we believe it can be turned—or whether the festering sore, through inaction and self-deception, shall be continued and grew worse.

SALE OF SHIPS IMPOSSIBLE WITHOUT AID.

The Shipping Board's loss of $50,000,000 a year, we aver, can be ended by a much lesser expense from the Treasury, through the direct and indirect aids proposed, and only in this way can the Government's good ships find a market by making private operation profitable. As quickly as possible we feel that the good ships should be liquidated, the poor ships disposed of, the Government put out of operation. The proposals made by the President contemplate that at an ultimate maximum expenditure of $32,000,000 per annum in direct aid, and through various forms of indirect aid, we will finally dispose of our ships for private operation, at a total annual cost of something over $40,000,000; and thus shall we end an operating loss of $50,000,000, give our people a better and a more assured service on the seas than America has ever enjoyed heretofore, successfully turning a war-time and war-built enterprise into a great instrument of peace-time profit and peace insurance.

At the present time there is, by and large, no market for our vast tonnage. Much of this tonnage cost over $200 per ton to build. About 1,300,000 dead-weight tons were sold at prices averaging $177 per ton since the end of the war. One hundred and seventy thousand tons have been paid for; on 390,000 tons the purchase has not been completed, and the ships are again in the possession of the board. In the case of 740,000 tons, we either must give vast relief on the amounts owing, or take the ships back. So that, compared to the total tonnage built by the Government, practically no tonnage has been disposed of. After months of deliberation, in January last the board decided to undertake to sell its tonnage at world-market prices; and on its steel freighters, after careful investigation, it found this to be a minimum of $30 per ton for the best tonnage. So depressed is world's shipping at present, and especially so timid are operators under the American flag, that we have even at these prices been able to dispose of but 100,000 dead-weight or 65,000 gross tons. Nor can we see any great hope of disposal of an appreciable part of the total tonnage we have, unless, through Government aid, the difference between our operation and that of the foreigner is provided for, and thereby automatically the competition of wasteful Government operation removed.

AID NEEDED TO OVERCOME HIGHER OPERATING COSTS.

Private ships under the American flag must be governmentally aided, because of the higher standards of living of American labor in the shipyard and on the ship. The man who builds ships on land works in America with a higher wage; the man who mans our ship is paid more and sustained better than the foreigner. Who in America would have it different? Who in America would question that the prosperity of one should be the common prosperity of all, and that these higher standards should prevail with all the people of our country? It is of prime importance, if we are to have an American merchant marine, that that merchant marine consist of ships built by American workmen in American yards; because, if we are once again engaged in war, unless we control our own yards and our own shipbuilding we will be lacking in the means of instant and sure repair and renewal.

FAST LOSING ART OF SHIPBUILDING.

With the limitations of armament and the holiday in naval shipbuilding the development of the private shipyard becomes more essential than ever, or the art of shipbuilding will be lost to America, and in time of war those nations of the world who kept their shipbuilding alive through overseas carrying will have an unmatchable advantage over us. So, with changed conditions, from the standpoint of our country's security alone, it is essential that we foster a private merchant marine built by American workmen.

Therefore, with higher costs of living and with higher capital charges, if we grant that for war and peace time purposes we need a merchant marine, the Government must, through aid to shipping, direct or indirect, or both, make good the difference between these added charges under the American and other flags. And further, only through aid to private shipping can we hope to end the great loss through governmental operation now existing and liquidate the Government's fleet.

AID PROPOSED IN THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1920.

When the present Shipping Board came into office, one of its major duties was to study and bring into life the provisions of the merchant marine act of 1920. This act provided for a sound system of indirect aids to American ships, chief of which was section 34 heretofore referred to, which called for preferential tariffs on imports when carried in American ships. For reasons before given, President Wilson refused to abrogate the treaties, which made impossible the functioning of section 34. The present Shipping Board unanimously memorialized President Harding to do that which President Wilson had refused to do. After long deliberation and careful investigation, President Harding concurred with President Wilson, and thus we have the will of both a Democratic and a Republican President—the greatest nonpartisan concurrence there could be—that, for the time being at least, the provisions of section 34 can not be carried out.

MUST OVERCOME LOSS OF SECTION 34.

Removing section 34 from the Jones Act, President Harding, whose interest in the establishment of an American merchant marine is second to that of no living man, realized that the very heart and essence of the act was gone, and that without the benefits of section 34 the other benefits would not be sufficient to accomplish the needed purposes. The President coupled his declination to make possible the invoking of section 34 with a request to the Shipping Board that it make a study of such aids as should be substituted to replace the beneficent provisions of the relegated section.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL.

With these problems before it, and with this premise unanimously adopted, the Shipping Board approached the study of the legislation which, when completed, the President proposed to the Congress.

The President's own first thought in substitution of section 34 was that the Government step into the breach created by the nonexistence of the benefits of section 34, by offering direct aids in the form of subsidies to American ships. For that purpose the President devised the plan that 10 per cent of all tariffs collected be placed in a fund for the upbuilding of America's privately owned merchant marine. How this very sound idea is to work out is best expressed by the President himself in his special message of February 28 to the Congress, as follows:

"The proposed aid of the Government to its merchant marine is to have its chief source in the duties collected on imports. Instead of applying the discriminating duty to the specific cargo, and thus encouraging only the inbound shipment, I propose that we shall collect all import duties, without discrimination as between American and foreign bottoms, and apply the heretofore proposed reduction to create a fund for the Government's aid to our merchant marine. By such a program we shall encourage not alone the carrying of inbound cargoes subject to our tariffs but we shall strengthen American ships in the carrying of that greater inbound tonnage on which no duties are levied, and, more important than these, we shall equip our merchant marine to serve our outbound commerce, which is the measure of our eminence in foreign trade."

DIRECT AID ALONE NOT ALWAYS A SUCCESS.

The Shipping Board immediately caused a study to be made of the history of direct aids to shipping. This study has been circulated among the Members of the Congress. There can be no doubt that the study shows that direct aids have failed quite as often as they have succeeded. Illuminating and parallel examples can be found in the cases of Japan and France. Similar cash subsidies resulted in Japan building up a most potent merchant marine for its purposes, while France fell far short of that desideratum. Obviously, therefore, there must have been other factors inherent in each of the individual countries that made for the differing results. Thus the Shipping Board soon came to the conclusion that it was problematic whether direct aids alone would accomplish the aims in mind.

DIVISION OF THOUGHT AS TO METHODS OF AID.

There have always been two great schools of thought in connection with Government aid to shipping—that which stands for direct aid in the form of cash subsidies and that which stands for indirect aids, where through favorable legislation preference is given to the home flag.

The opposition to Government aid to an American merchant marine has not always sprung from honest or disinterested purposes. The foreigner who has had the benefit of the profits that inured from carrying America's trade, the American shipowner, banker, and importer who has profited through his connections with foreign carrying companies, have all, consciously or unconsciously, properly or improperly, been opposed at times to the establishment of an American merchant marine. When direct aids have been proposed, the honest proponents of indirect aids have cried that only their methods should be adopted, and those with selfish purpose and dishonest interests have joined them in their cry. When indirect aids have been proposed, the proponents of direct aids have insisted that only their methods should be tried, and those with selfish and dishonest interests have joined on such occasions to the contrary.

SINISTER FORCES AT WORK COVERTLY.

We hold no quarrel with the foreigner, who would do all he can to prevent the establishment of an American merchant marine, that the profit of our carriage might inure to him. But we ask that there at least be a public understanding of the sinister forces that are at work—forces that can not be measured, that can not be detected, that can not be cornered—who use their instruments subtly among honest men. The day has come when we must, in common understanding, approach this subject. Happily, the Shipping Board, after long and careful study, came to the conclusion that a proper measure of Government aid to accomplish the purposes in mind could only come through the use of both direct and indirect aids, throwing the burden onto the indirect aid.

COMBINATION OF BOTH METHODS IN PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Under the chairmanship of Commissioner Lissner, in conjunction with the chairman of the Shipping Board, and aided by an ample staff of experts, the Shipping Board made a study of all forms of indirect and direct aids ascertainable. A plan has been worked out whereby a very sound system of indirect aids is proposed. It is proposed in addition to give direct aid to a sufficient extent to make possible in good years earnings of 10 per cent or more for ships—surely not a very large earning where capital has to be attracted in competition with other enterprises. Beyond 10 per cent the earnings will be divided equally between the owner and the Government until all of the direct aid shall have been paid back into the merchant-marine fund to be created for the aid of shipping, after which the ships retain all of the surplus earnings, if any. If the indirect aids proposed should be sufficient in any annual period to bring proper returns, there would be no direct aid retained. Thus the burden of the aid is thrown on the indirect.

ALL POSSIBLE INDIRECT AIDS RECOMMENDED.

Thus the proponent of indirect aids can have no occasion to quarrel with the proposals; for, as the Shipping Board recommends every practical indirect aid possible to give, if those indirect aids should not be sufficient, no one can question that the Government should, from its Treasury, if ships are a national necessity, if the Government's loss in operation is to be ended and its fleet sold, help to the extent of making possible earnings of 10 per cent in good years. The proponents of direct aid certainly can raise no objection to indirect aids being first called into being, reliance being placed on direct aids only if the indirect aids are not sufficient. Therefore, in the legislation proposed by the President to the Congress through the Shipping Board's study, there can be no quarrel between the two schools of Government aid.

NO OPPORTUNITY FOR PROFITEERING.

This legislation proposes a very proper profit limitation—10 per cent on the earnings of ships, and after that equal division of earnings between the owner and the merchant-marine fund until the subsidy is returned. Surely such an allowance of earnings can not be called profiteering, because, while the ships are allowed a net profit of 10 per cent before beginning to return the subsidy, and thereafter are allowed half the net profit until the entire amount of the subsidy is returned, nowhere in the Shipping Board study is it proposed that ships be protected against loss. Under the proposal made, including the right of the Shipping Board to make 10-year contracts, there will be many years during which, with all the aids given, ships will lose money; and it is universally conceded that in the shipping business, through the years of plenty and years of famine, the average that any ship can earn through the proposed Government aid during the term of its 10-year contract is a very modest sum.

NEED FOR ADEQUATE AND SUFFICIENT ASSISTANCE.

There is no hope of the establishment of a merchant marine through insufficient aid. Rather than insufficient aid, let us have no aid at all, and leave the question open until such time as we will give sufficient aid to insure our purpose. The achievement of our purpose should be our aim, not to fool ourselves and others and achieve failure by doing too little when we seem to be doing enough. We should take advantage at this time to write on our statute books every possible indirect aid that can be uncovered and which can properly be used. The Shipping Board believes that in its proposed study it has done so. This legislation can be constantly amended, if new forms of indirect aid be found, until finally the need of direct aids disappears. But until the indirect aids have proved what they can do, until American ships have a larger volume of business, we must have some measure of direct aid, however, with proper limitation on profit.

We must do enough or nothing. We seek substance, not shadows. To do less than enough is merely to have sold out to the defeatists who would have no American merchant marine. We must stand firm for no compromise less than that which is sufficient, but we should yield nothing to possible profiteering. The Shipping Board stands boldly in its affirmation that its study and its proposal, unique though it is, would accomplish these purposes.

INDIRECT AIDS.

I shall not undertake now to discuss, save briefly, the various measures of indirect aids proposed. These will be covered in fullest detail, subject to your cross-examination, by those who are expert. I shall, however, briefly sketch what is asked.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT FLEET AT WORLD PRICES.

It is asked that the Shipping Board fleet be sold at world prices, regardless of cost of construction. The cost of construction is a war cost and should be written down to zero. Whatever we get out of the salvage is a profit; and if this fleet, built for war, can be turned to peace-time purposes, we shall verily have performed the miracle of turning the sword into the plowshare. No other of our war-time expenditures will have had such noble salvage.

The sale of the Shipping Board fleet at world prices means that those who buy will not have higher capital charges than others to the extent of the tonnage they thus acquire. Therefore in our study of direct aid we allow a minimum for such type of ships.

MUST SELL AT WORLD PRICES.

Experience has taught that we could not sell the Government-owned fleet at higher than world prices for similar tonnage if we would, and we should not if we could. There is no greater aid to equalize capital charges that can be rendered than to sell the Government-owned fleet at world prices. More we can not get, anyhow. Ships sold at such prices, should they earn, with Government aid, above 10 per cent, will perforce pay back to the Government half of the added earnings until the full direct aid is returned to the merchant marine fund. So that the Government will get the benefit of the low price at which it sells the ship. And if a ship, so sold at such a price, does not have earnings in any year above 10 per cent, the best proof will have been given that the ship should not have been sold at a higher price.

Did the Government not possess this vast freight fleet which should meet our needs for that type for years to come, the amount of direct aid which we would have to ask from the Congress and the Treasury would most likely be doubled. Thus we make sound use, on the one hand, for indirect aid purposes of our freight tonnage, and at the same time accelerate the possibility of its disposal, on the other hand.

In order to insure that the sale of the Government's tonnage should carry out the spirit of the act of 1920, and should foster the ownership by communities of lines serving their districts, it is provided that local interests in the seaboard communities, and in the inland districts naturally tributary thereto, shall have not less than two years in which to organize steamship companies and to secure the capital necessary to purchase the lines which the board is operating from such communities.

CONSTRUCTION LOAN FUND.

Section 11 of the present Jones Act provides that for a term of five years the Shipping Board may recover into a construction loan fund $25,000,000 annually, or a total of $125,000,000. Thus far the Shipping Board, like the horse that eats its head off, has used all the moneys for operation and construction that have come to it from liquidation, and there is nothing in the loan fund. The board, however, hopes with proposed appropriations soon to be made available, to have its debts liquidated at no late date, and asks that it be permitted out of further liquidation to accrue to the construction loan fund as expeditiously as possible the $125,000,000, and begs permission to loan this at rates as low as 2 per cent.

GREAT CUNARDERS VIRTUALLY GIFT.

Great Britain, feeling a commercial and naval need for the Mauretania and Lusitania, built these ships for the Cunard line at an interest charge of 2½ per cent. However, Britain furnished all the money, gave them 20 years to pay it off, and gave the company an annual subsidy that equaled the amount of interest and amortization to be paid. So that in effect the British Government made the Cunard Co. a present of the ships. Nothing so drastic is proposed by the Shipping Board.

OWNER MUST DO HIS PART.

We propose at most to loan two-thirds of the value of the ship; the balance must be furnished by the owner. The low interest rate will be given only for special types of ships that will be considered essential for the building of a balanced merchant marine for peace and war time purposes, and will be measured with a view to equalizing capital costs. Again, the limitation of profit comes into play; because, if the lower interest rate results in increased earnings at above 10 per cent, half of those increased earnings come back into the merchant marine fund until the subsidy received is paid back in any one year. If the earnings should not be 10 per cent it will be proved that the Government wisely loaned the money at 2 per cent to insure that these types of ships, which are as needed as warships themselves, be built. It is this construction loan fund that is our greatest insurance for continued operation of private shipyards in America.

INCOME TAX RELIEF.

Another form of indirect aids proposed is in income tax relief. In order to create an incentive for shippers to use American-flag ships and as a stimulus to our foreign trade, a deduction from net Federal income tax payable should be allowed on the basis of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels. This deduction in time might amount to eight or ten million dollars per year.

Through cooperation with the Treasury Department and by legislation a greater allowance for depreciation for income tax purposes should be made on ships in order to make the depreciation allowance more accurately represent the actual depreciation of vessels and to give effect to the marked slump in the value of tonnage during the past several years.

Section 23 of the merchant marine act should be amended so that the payment of all income taxes (which would otherwise be payable on net earnings of vessels in foreign trade) shall be waived by the Government when the amount of such taxes is applied to half the cost of new ship construction—increasing same from one-third as at present.

IMPORTANCE OF THIS DEDUCTION.

It is the belief of the Shipping Board that the proposed deduction from net Federal income tax of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels may do more to aid in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine than any proposal which is herein submitted to the Congress.

Section 34 provided preferential tariffs for American-flag ships, but this could only be applicable to dutiable imports. The operation of section 34 gave no preference to American ships on exports, and no preference to American ships on nondutiable imports. The proposed 5 per cent deduction from taxes of the freights paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels, now made, should insure a preference to American shippers on every ton of goods sold abroad or bought for consumption at home. This 5 per cent deduction is made in substitution of section 34, but we of the Shipping Board believe it is possible that this section will accomplish at less cost to the Treasury much more than might have been accomplished by section 34.

NEW MERCHANT MARINE PRACTICALLY PIONEER.

The greatest disadvantage, outside of added capital charge and added wage and subsistence cost, which American ships have endured, is the fact that, in overseas carriage, other nations, which have for a century or more successfully operated, control the volume of trade, and American ships must undergo the great expense of building up that volume.

When a man engages in a new business he must suffer the expense of establishing himself in the trade while his established competitor is enjoying the profit of the volume that comes from long operations. Nothing that can be devised, the Shipping Board feels, will so greatly insure volume to American ships as the 5 per cent tax deduction here proposed.

Again the limitations of profit come into play. If the 5 per cent is no inducement, then there will be no tax deduction; if it is an inducement, American ships will secure largely increased volume, many will thereby earn over 10 per cent, and half the excess beyond that modest profit will go into the merchant-marine fund until the subsidy is repaid.

DIVISION OF IMMIGRATION.

It is proposed through cooperation with the Bureau of Immigration of the Department of Labor that regulations should be prescribed and legislation enacted that would insure to American-flag passenger ships at least 50 per cent of the immigration coming to this country.

Such regulations shall not go into effect until existing treaties are modified sufficiently to permit. The President is directed to undertake such negotiations as may be necessary, and upon completing such negotiations to proclaim the taking effect of this provision.

Had such a provision been enacted during that pre-war period when immigration was at its height—1,200,000 per annum—and had half of that number of immigrants come in American-flag ships, the Shipping Board believes that instead of having only 15 passenger ships under the American flag in 1914, in the north Atlantic at least we would have had as many passenger ships of the third-class type as any nation in the world, Great Britain not excepted.

OVERLOOKED INVALUABLE IMMIGRATION AID.

Had we husbanded and used our rights, had we shown the slightest interest in or desire for a merchant marine, without one cent of aid from the Treasury, through the enactment of an immigration proposal such as here put forth, we had in the flood tide of immigration within our grasp the means of establishing a valuable branch of the merchant marine. Should this proposal work out as the Shipping Board believes it will, the limitation of profits will again come into play, and many of the third-class passenger ships—and better classes of passenger ships for that—will earn over 10 per cent as a result of this immigration legislation. The plus beyond the 10 per cent will be equally divided between the owner and the merchant-marine fund until the subsidy is repaid.

REQUIRES GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES TO USE AMERICAN SHIPS.

It is proposed that all Government agents from whatever department who travel abroad make use of American-flag ships. It would appear unseemly that Congress should have to be petitioned to make such action mandatory by law; but, sad to relate, many if not most of the servants of the Government traveling abroad use the ships of foreign flag, giving ofttimes as their excuse that they do so as a compliment to the country to which they are going. One has never heard of a foreigner using an American-flag ship as a compliment to us!

To increase the revenues of American vessels and to furnish an example for all American citizens to follow in giving preference to American ships, therefore legislation should be enacted that will prohibit hereafter the overseas transportation of passengers or freight at the expense of the Government other than in a vessel flying the American flag, unless suitable and convenient transportation by an American vessel is not obtainable.

ARMY TRANSPORT SERVICE.

Based on current commercial rates and on the volume of passenger and cargo movement for 1921 on trans-Pacific traffic alone, the total charge for transporting Government passengers and cargo by commercial vessels would be, approximately, $7,500,000 per annum. There can be no economic justification for the withholding of this business from Shipping Board ships which are available or from privately owned ships. The withdrawal of the Army and Navy transport services, which the President should be authorized to effect by Executive order in whole or in part, will materially reduce the operating losses of the Shipping Board, and should largely aid in the disposal of many of its vessels. It is estimated that during the first year the diversion of this traffic to the trans-Pacific Shipping Board services or to privately owned lines would result in increased net earnings to the Shipping Board or such privately owned lines of approximately $5,000,000. This business would be an impelling inducement to private owners to purchase at a fair valuation the Shipping Board passenger-cargo vessels adapted for this service.

The volume of business afforded to trans-Pacific lines through the Army and Navy transport service should do much to aid in bringing earnings to 10 per cent, after which half of the earnings will be returned to the merchant-marine fund until the full subsidy is repaid.

EXTENSION OF COASTWISE RESTRICTIONS.

Inasmuch as the trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States has been free since the passage of the tariff act of 1913 it is felt that there can be no valid objection to the extension of our coastwise laws to include our trade with those islands, as provided in section 21 of the merchant marine act. The trade with the Philippines would not suffer in any respect, since there is available an adequate supply of American ships to carry the entire commerce.

INCREASED PROSPERITY OF PORTO RICO AND HAWAII.

There are those who make crying arguments against section 21 being declared operative. These are either poorly informed, or are the tools of foreign shipowners who have profited by past conditions. It is with mixed amusement and indignation that one reads through the cries of warning issued when Hawaii and Porto Rico were about to be declared coastwise. The objectors drew dire pictures of calamity to those two islands if they should be included in the coastwise laws of America, though they enjoy the benefits of free trade with us. The arguments brought to bear against the coastwise inclusion of Porto Rico and Hawaii are almost, sentence for sentence, word for word, syllable for syllable, the arguments made against bringing the Philippines into our coastwise law. But the history of the accelerated prosperity of Porto Rico and Hawaii since their coastwise inclusion gives emphatic contradiction to the objections now being raised by the ignorant and the selfish and the foreign.

PREFERENTIAL THROUGH RATES ON AMERICAN RAILROADS.

It is believed by many that considerable indirect aid will result from the making effective of section 28 of the merchant marine act. The legislation is mandatory and its real worth can only be determined by actual trial. The Shipping Board is making an exhaustive investigation of the practical application of this section as a preliminary to certification to the Interstate Commerce Commission that adequate shipping facilities are afforded by American ships.

There has been a certain amount of fear on the part of various communities as to the local effect of this section. To remove any apprehension, the section is amended so that when both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board are of the opinion that its operation will materially change the channels of transportation within the United States or unduly congest ports of the United States, the commission may suspend the operation of the section.

COORDINATION OF RAIL AND WATER FACILITIES.

The railroad systems of the United States feel the need of definite import and export working agreements with steamships engaged in foreign trade. A number of such agreements have been made in the past, and some are still in force. They have usually been with foreign steamship lines; such agreements to-day are prejudicial to American shipping. It would seem expedient and wise to permit reasonable working arrangements to exist between railroads and steamships, with special reference to the interchange of traffic between the roads and vessels of the United States.

The problem of fully and completely coordinating our rail and water transportation is acute and important. The solution of this problem will involve extensive research and study of the facts and principles involved. The work, of course, calls for the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as well as of the United States Shipping Board. The suggestion has been made that a group of experts should be created, to be appointed jointly by these two bodies, whose chief duty would be to make full inquiry and to formulate appropriate rules and regulations providing for such coordination, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board.

ADDED IMPETUS FOR INVESTMENT OF NEW CAPITAL.

At the same time an added impetus can be given the investment of new capital in American shipping and in the possible purchase of vessels from the United States Shipping Board, if railroad interests are permitted to own and develop steamship lines operated exclusively in foreign trade. To do this effectively it would be necessary to modify section 5 of the interstate commerce act to the extent that vessels may be thus owned when exclusively engaged in foreign commerce. The provisions of that act would remain in full force, so far as they prohibit the use of the Canal by vessels owned by railroad interests, if the vessels are engaged in traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coast of the United States. This would leave intact the main purpose of the original provision, which was to insure the competitive advantages of water-borne intercoastal traffic against the control of transcontinental railroads.

These are the indirect aids which the President asks the Congress to enact into legislation.

DIRECT AID.

In its study the Shipping Board has undertaken to make a proposal that shall put American ships on a basis of equality with Great Britain, which has the next highest cost of operation to ours. At no time did we consider aids, direct or indirect, that should do anything for the American owner but place him on a parity with Great Britain. Others will explain to you how we arrive at the basis of direct aid, which may be necessary to take up the slack between the benefits inuring from the indirect aid proposed and the amount needed to place costs on a parity with those of Great Britain.

The difference in costs will be not alone that existing at present. Recognizing the imperative need of an American merchant marine in the true sense of the word, the bill provides that no vessel shall receive compensation unless two-thirds or more of her entire crew, exclusive of officers, are American citizens. The officers are required to be citizens by law. The remainder of the crew must be eligible for citizenship, which bars from employment on compensated vessels crews drawn from the so-called Asiatic barred zone. Because of the difficulty of training American citizens to be servants and waiters, the steward's department on passenger ships is exempted from this requirement.

The effect of demanding a fixed proportion of American citizens on board ship and the setting of that proportion at a figure much higher than that which obtains to-day will result in an increased wage differential even beyond that which exists to-day.

AMOUNT OF DIRECT AID.

The direct aid is computed on a differential based on a combination of speed, tonnage, and distance covered, starting with a half cent per gross ton per hundred miles steamed in the foreign trade for ships under 13 knots, and increasing to a total of 2.6 cents per gross ton per hundred miles steamed for ships of 23 knots and over. It is estimated that in order to develop a balanced fleet of 7,500,000 gross tons, which should carry 50 per cent at least of all branches of our overseas trade, the cost to the Treasury will ultimately approximate $30,000,000, though for the first year it is estimated at only $15,000,000.

The details of how this will work out require technical and lengthy illumination, which will later be given you by those who are expert.

DIRECT AID PROPOSED MODEST.

I wish only to state that from the investigations made by the Shipping Board we think this sum a very modest one. If it should enable us to soon get the Emergency Fleet Corporation out of operation and save the greater part of the $50,000,000 loss which now burdens the Treasury, the direct aid here proposed should and will more than pay for itself. It is for that reason that we stand firm in the guaranty to Congress that before long the amount paid out in cash subsidy to American ships will be more than equalized by decreased appropriations for the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

It was obviously impossible to compute a basis of Government aid that will be exact. It is no more possible to figure out a system of direct aid for shipping on exact lines than it is possible to enact a tariff bill or a tax bill that will work out with exact justice. When one legislates in the abstract for such vast undertakings, covering differing operations under differing conditions, one can figure at best on the average. But happily in the present proposed legislation, by the limitation on profit the inequalities are equalized in the ultimate.

PROPOSE LESS AID THAN NOW GIVEN IN ONE CASE.

Because of the great value it places on the indirect aids, the Shipping Board figured a very modest sum for direct aids. For instance, there are to-day two subsidized ships of the Oceanic Steamship Co. under the American flag going to Australasia. They now receive in postal subsidies $85,000 per ship per year. It is our understanding that the owners of these ships, at the expiration of their present contract with the Post Office Department, will refuse to renew their contract because they can not operate the ships with profit. Even though these ships can not be profitably operated, it may be essential to our potential trade that they continue on those routes. Under the proposed direct aid these ships would each receive but $60,000 per year, or $25,000 less than they are receiving at present, and the owners now refuse to renew the present arrangement because it does not sufficiently recompense them.

FLEXIBILITY PERMITS AID WHERE AID IS NEEDED.

This instance is cited to illustrate, first, the safe basis on which the direct aids have been proposed by the Shipping Board; and, second, the need of giving elasticity to the Shipping Board in the application of direct aid. Therefore it is proposed in the law that the Shipping Board have the power in the contracts which it makes with subsidized lines to lessen the amount of direct aid, or to increase it up to double the scheduled amount.

PROFIT LIMITATION ALWAYS A SAFEGUARD.

In the case of the Australasian lines, it is obvious that even with the indirect aids, the direct aid proposed may not be sufficient. Under the law as requested the Shipping Board would have the right to give these ships more direct aid than the law provides; but again the limitation of profit feature comes in as an automatic check on mistaken judgment or preference, for if the Shipping Board allowed too much, when the profit reaches 10 per cent in any one year, half of the plus profit returns to the merchant marine fund until the subsidy is repaid. And if the ships do not earn 10 per cent, surely there can be no question of a profiteering subsidy.

In the need for a balanced merchant marine it is conceivable that the Shipping Board would want to induce private capital to build various types of very expensive ships that could not be profitably operated without a large measure of Government aid—passenger ships, refrigerator ships, ships convertible to hospital and airplane purposes.

ELASTICITY CLAUSE EXPLAINED.

It is possible in the development of our peace-time trade with proper vision that the Shipping Board would want to send ships on routes where no cargo movement nearly sufficient to insure profitable operation exists, but where, if for a given length of time we had ships plying regularly, such movement could be created to the great profit of our agriculturists, our manufacturers, our exporters, and our importers. To such ships, in the interests of all our people, the Shipping Board asks the privilege to have elastic right to give up to double of the aid provided for in the proposed legislation. But again the limitations on profit comes into play; should the amount given by the Shipping Board result in accrued earnings of over 10 per cent in any one year, half of the plus earnings would be returned to the merchant marine fund. And if these needed ships or needed routes we aid, in statesman-like vision, to insure our future should not earn 10 per cent, surely there can be no question of a profiteering subsidy.

AID DECREASES AS EARNINGS INCREASE.

On the other hand, there can be no doubt that if the Shipping Board possesses proper wisdom and interest, in some cases it will perceive in advance that the subsidy called for in the proposed legislation might insure earnings greater than 10 per cent, but not enough greater so that the half of the excess would result in all the subsidy being returned to the merchant marine fund. In such cases the Shipping Board asks the right to make contracts for a lesser amount than provided for in the law, because the Shipping Board does not want to knowingly give direct aid which, in addition to the indirect aids, will insure too great a constant profit at the public expense.

It is impossible to apply any direct aid by blanket legislation which, when added to unascertainable benefits from indirect aids for varying types of ships in varying trades under carrying conditions, shall put our ships on a parity with Great Britain and attractive to private capital. Therefore elasticity should be given to the Shipping Board in the application of the direct aid that insured fleets of right types should be encouraged in needed trades. But by limitations on profit, the Treasury is guaranteed against mistakes in judgment, and profiteering can not result.

ELASTICITY BUILDING UP DIVERSIFIED PORTS.

It might be well to point out that the elasticity provision of the proposed law will give potential power to the Shipping Board to build up ports as well as shipping lines—that the whole people of the United States, particularly the farmer and manufacturer of the interior, may be insured facilities geographically diversified to make certain prompt port handling of his shipments.

A further benefit by giving the Shipping Board elasticity in the application of direct aid comes from the fact that thereby the possibility of retaliation is largely averted. If foreign nations know that the Shipping Board can meet retaliatory increases of subsidy immediately, they will be slow to go into such competition, because they know that they can neither force nor frighten us out.

MUST RETURN PART OF EARNINGS TO GOVERNMENT.

In the proposed legislation the possible earnings are not limited to 10 per cent, but may permissibly go to any extent beyond 10 per cent, save that 50 per cent of the excess earnings is returned to the fund until the subsidy is repaid, in order to attract capital into investment in ships, and that too big a premium be not put on the inefficient. If the efficient operator is limited in earnings to 10 per cent and must pay all profits above that earning back to the merchant marine fund, we thereby subsidize the inefficient operator in a continuance of his inefficiency and destroy his initiative, to the hurt of the unbuilding of the American merchant marine. Or, if the earnings of the efficient operator must remain static until the inefficient catch up with him, the encouragement flows to the inefficient at the expense of efficiency.

MUST STIMULATE SHIPPING INVESTMENT.

In America there is neither consciousness nor desire for investment in shipping. Competition with investment opportunity on land in America has made investment in ship securities very unattractive to our people, and those who have invested have had sorry experience. We must, if we are to attract those who put their money in common stocks, allow profits, continuous and increasing, according to merit and condition of the times and permit reserves to be created for losing years. For these reasons it would be a sad mistake to cut the profit off at 10 per cent in its entirety until the subsidy is repaid into the merchant marine fund. The investor must know that there is no point when through efficient operation he can not get an expectancy of some increased return.

The study of the limitation of profit has been made with a view to insuring that every dollar paid out of the Public Treasury brings creative results to the American merchant marine on the one hand, and still minimizes that measure of governmental supervision and interference which might make the private owner timid.

DETAILS OF LIMITATION OF PROFIT FEATURE.

The limitation of profit follows only those ships which qualify as being entitled to the aid. If a company operates several ships, some of them making money and some losing money, the company can take the earnings of the ships jointly to get an average.

It is in the national interest that all ships be aided which helpfully build up trade for the national wealth. There are companies where ship operations are only a minor part of the total operations of the company and incidental thereto. In such companies, therefore, the Shipping Board eliminates any profits or losses made on operations that accrue from any sources save ships.

NO OPPORTUNITY FOR FRAUD.

If a shipping company desires to invest a large sum of money in a building as an advertisement, if it goes into the financing business, that is an operation and a risk entirely aside from any interest the Government as a whole holds in shipping, and the profit or the loss accrues entirely to the company. One company may operate ships only and have no outside investments. Another company may operate ships and go into vast building and banking enterprises. To put all on a parity, we consider only ships and ship operations in the profit limitations.

TREASURY CHECKS EARNINGS.

That there may not be undue Government interference, the check on profits is made by the Treasury Department and not by the Shipping Board. It is proposed that the return be made by the operator on the same return where he attests to the Treasury for his corporation's income tax, and the Treasury checks up on the ships' operations at the same time that it checks upon the corporation or individual tax, thus doing away with any added Government supervision of operations than that which exists to-day through the work of the Internal Revenue Department. We believe we have worked out a plan in the limitations of profit which, when explained to you in detail, will serve on the one hand to protect the Treasury, and on the other hand to automatically inspire efficient operation and the proper covering of needed routes.

MISUSE OF AID GUARDED AGAINST.

At one time the French Government in its possibly mistaken effort to develop a merchant marine largely of sailing ships—because the country did not lend itself naturally to the construction nor operation of steamers—subsidized heavily on a mileage basis ocean-going sailing craft. The cost of operation of a sailing ship is comparatively low. In normal operation this is balanced by the fact that its revenue is equally low. With the subsidy granted by the French, however, it became possible, owing to the low cost of sailing ship operation, to move sailing ships about the world largely or wholly in ballast and to derive returns entirely from the subsidy.

This circumstance has been brought up many times since as an argument against direct aid to shipping. It is a faulty argument because it does not apply to steamers. A moment's reflection will show the impossibility of operating a steam vessel for subsidy alone. Taking the smallest class allowed, 1,500 gross tons, and giving her the benefit of the aid accruing to a 5,000-ton ship, and further assuming that she covered a distance of 240 miles per day, she would derive for that 240 miles but $60. To steam that 240 miles she must have expended $120 in burning 20 tons of coal, at least, at a probable minimum cost of $6 per ton. Thus it can be seen that her fueling alone will be twice the amount of direct aid collected under the most favorable circumstances. With wages, subsistence, stores, repairs, interest, insurance, and depreciation to meet, there is no fear that the small amount of direct aid recommended will permit inefficient operation when it only meets half of the fuel costs alone.

NO INSURANCE OF PROFITS.

Even with the most efficient operation there is nowhere contained in this proposed legislation a guarantee of profit. In very bad years, when British shipping as a whole loses money, it is conceivable that, with all the aids proposed, direct and indirect, our ships may lose. There is nothing in the proposed legislation that insures profits on the one hand or encourages profiteering on the other. The reason for allowing 10 per cent in good years and half of the plus over 10 per cent until the subsidy is repaid to the merchant marine fund is that companies may build up a reserve to tide them over the losing years, which are not infrequent in the shipping business.

All shipowners getting the benefit of subsidies must pay back into the merchant marine fund the moneys they receive for the carriage of the mails, which is now fast amounting to $5,000,000. The subsidy proposed by this legislation is the only subsidy the carrier would receive. In effect the mails, other than parcel post, would be carried free. Thus we would be insured much better mail service for the development of our trade; for, instead of mails waiting at the dock to be carried by specially subsidized ships, we would send them in unlimited quantities on the first ship available.

STABILITY ESSENTIAL TO CONFIDENCE OF INVESTORS.

The legislation asks the right to make 10-year contracts. Shipping men generally question that this period is long enough. They argue, for reasons which later they will lay before your committee, that 15 years should be the period of the contract. The Shipping Board hopes and feels that within 10 years, through then established trade routes, the freights inuring to American ships under the beneficial provisions of the indirect aids of the proposed law will have sufficiently increased to make direct aid largely unnecessary. It is for that reason that the Shipping Board takes a differing position from the private owner. However, that contracts be made for a period of 10 years is essential, for it is a notorious fact, known to all, that American ships, without the proposed aid, can not, by and large, profitably operate, and investors will refuse to put their moneys into securities of American ships unless they know they are protected by at least 10-year contracts.

NATIONAL POLICY WOULD BRING NEW LIFE.

The Shipping Board wishes to emphasize to your committee and to the Congress that world shipping is now more depressed than it has ever been in proportion to world tonnage. Capital is hard to get; operators are timid, not only because of the lack of cargoes but because of the uncertainty that hangs over shipping all over the world, through the possible continuous competition in operation of the American Government and through the unliquidated tonnage owned by our Government. The greatest stabilizer for world shipping conditions, and particularly for American shipowners and operators, that would come would be the enactment of the legislation proposed by the President, that will give a national policy to American shipping, and in behalf of which the Shipping Board is now appearing before you. Courage would immediately come to the American owner, and new life, we believe, would be given to the American investor.

CONCLUSIONS.

However, so vast an undertaking can not be quickly liquidated. We believe that of the 700 good freight ships we have the Shipping Board would feel very happy if, within 30 months from the time of the passage of this bill, it could dispose of sufficient ships to take care of the routes it is now operating and put the Emergency Fleet Corporation out of business as an operating company. This, however, the Shipping Board believes is within the realm of promisable accomplishment, and this the Shipping Board believes it can in good faith encourage the Congress to believe will be brought about.

In the human body many organs are vital. Without the heart, the lungs, the liver, the brain, life is not possible. No man can say which is the more vital organ. And so in our national life are many organs vital. Which is the most vital no man can say, but without the possession of any one of the vital organs the Nation can no more live than can the individual. In the development of our national being the merchant marine for peace and war purposes has become a vital organ. Government operation makes that organ a diseased one.

NATION FACES ISSUE IT CAN NOT DODGE.

We are now face to face with the solution of this great national problem. The Shipping Board believes the proposal of the President, if adopted by the Congress without major change, will bring to America a healthy organ in a merchant marine, one consonant with our national strength, with our national potentialities, and with our national desires. The salient proposals made are as a mosaic, where each part fits into the other. The Shipping Board stands fast for the general principles covered. But in the application of details, both by law and regulation, the board feels free to say that there may be points that should be further explored and various views that should be considered. Any radical change in the proposals might, however, result in the destruction of the whole.

URGENCY OF THE SITUATION.

For reasons which we have sketched to you, the inefficiencies of the Government operation, the great loss thereby accruing through the continuance of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the uncertainty in the minds of private owners because of that continued operation, and the need of a policy to insure the disposition of the Government-owned fleet, all testify to the fact that expedition is the essence in the enactment of the legislation for which the President has asked. Delay may be fatal. The Shipping Board would view with alarm inaction by this Congress on the legislation which the President asked in behalf of our merchant marine.

PROPOSAL NONPARTISAN—ALL AMERICAN.

If you accept not our proposal, we join the President in asking that you make a contra one, for, if the status quo remains, we know that as a merchant marine power we shall be bankrupt.

We come before you pleading an all-American question, nonpartisan, with the unanimous recommendation of all the members of our board, Democratic and Republican alike. We come before you to plead that through the enactment of the legislation proposed by the President America may take its place on the seas as it has won its place on the land. We come before you to plead that an instrument of war be turned into a glorious and profitable instrument of peace, and that we thereby insure to coming generations the heritage which should rightly be theirs.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 for completing the wagon road on the Quinault Indian Reservation between Taholah and Moclips, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease of citrus canker and for applying such methods of eradication or control of the disease as, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be necessary, and for cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned and organizations of growers or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purpose, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 28, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 27, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we pray in the name of Him who has broken the silence of eternity. He has given us the fadeless messages of love and hope. We bless Thee that His throne is in the highest heaven and in the humblest breast. Hold Thou His cross before us, and be gracious to receive and ready to forgive. Kindle in all hearts the light and warmth of Thy presence. May we recognize the government of God in all its fullness. Cleanse, enlighten, and uplift all peoples. Grant that every institution of our land that makes for righteousness, intelligence, equal rights to all, and a larger America may receive the benediction of Thy grace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 11393. An act to abolish the office of Superintendent of the Library Building and Grounds and to transfer the duties thereof to the Architect of the Capitol and the Librarian of Congress; and

H. J. Res. 344. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FAIRFIELD, for to-day, on account of illness.

TRADING IN GRAIN FUTURES.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last night the bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges and for other purposes had been ordered to a third reading, and the reading of the engrossed bill was demanded. The engrossed bill is now here. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire the reading of the engrossed bill?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on that vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of having the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted.

Pending the count—

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as are in favor of the passage of the bill will as their names are called vote yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 211, nays 76, answered "present" 2, not voting 141, as follows:

RETURN OF A BILL TO THE SENATE.

The Speaker laid before the House the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 20 (calendar day, June 24), 1922.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the message of the Senate announcing the action of the Senate upon the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 831) entitled "An act to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act."

The resolution was agreed to.

CORNELIUS COLE.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph marked in the book which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Document, volume 56, No. 654, Biographical Congressional Directory, 1774 to 1911, page 559.

Cole, Cornelius, a Representative and a Senator from California; born in Lodi, N. Y., September 17, 1822; was graduated from Wesleyan University, Connecticut, in 1847; studied law and was admitted to the bar in Auburn, N. Y., May 1, 1848; went to California in 1849, and after working a year in the gold mines commenced practice; district attorney of Sacramento City and County in 1859–1862; member of the Republican National Committee 1856–1860, moved to Santa Cruz; elected as a Union Republican to the Thirty-eighth Congress (March 4, 1863–March 3, 1865); elected a United States Senator and served from March 4, 1867, to March 3, 1873; in 1880 moved to Colgrove, Los Angeles County, Calif., and retired from practice.

[Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make profert of the oldest man of my acquaintance. If you had seen his family as I have this morning, and had the 10 minutes' conversation that I had with him, you would say, "Is it possible?" I think he breaks the record. His long service in the Republic has been able and honorable. It is a great privilege for me to introduce him to the House in which he served so long ago, and I have no doubt that the membership would be very glad to give him a brief moment to thank you and say what he may desire. [Applause.]

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for five minutes for the purpose of permitting Mr. Cole to address the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly, at 12 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess until 12 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.

(During the recess.)

Mr. CORNELIUS COLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I suppose you are fully aware that you are the Representatives of the foremost Nation of the world. [Applause.] You are here as the representatives of the founders of the Government. You will remember that when it was founded by our ancestors it was but a small part of America and a small portion of the New World. Our ancestors made a wonderful discovery at that time, a most wonderful discovery in the history of the world; it was the discovery that all men were created equal [applause] and created with the right of enjoying life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our ancestors were not discouraged; although few in number, they were violently opposed in their new doctrine, but they persisted, and after a period of war for several years waged to defeat their discovery, they succeeded in establishing it, and the result is this great Republic of the world. [Applause.]

Our destiny no one can forecast. Our hopes are wide awake. From the little colony, as I said, a mere handful, only 3,000,000, we have now become a people of the New World with 110,000,000. It was a long time after the discovery of America before it was occupied by the discoverers—nearly 150 years elapsed before that occurred. Then they continued to grow until 150 years ago they laid down the principle of their Government based upon the new-found doctrine of equal rights. They persisted in their efforts until we became the Nation that we are at the present, the foremost in the land. From a few weak colonists we have become what we are to-day, and I think we all ought to remember, above all things, the wonderful character of those who created the Republic and the Government in America. [Applause.]

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the Hon. Cornelius Cole, just made, be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the remarks by Mr. Cole be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to represent a district which is now a portion of the great district which the Hon. Cornelius Cole so ably represented in this House in the Thirty-eighth Congress some 60 years ago. California has produced many great and honorable citizens whose names are written high on the national scroll of fame. None of them in public or private life have rendered greater service to the Nation or to that great State than has this distinguished citizen who stands before us. We hope in California, and that hope is reflected throughout this body, as has been manifested by the great ovation which he has received here to-day when presented by that venerable Member, Hon. JOSEPH GURNEY CANNON, of Illinois [applause], whom we all love and respect, that he will live for years to come, so that his rich experience and guiding counsels may continue to help the younger generations of Californians to shape their lives along the path of high patriotic ideals and achievements which he has so worthily exemplified. [Applause.] California is proud of the Hon. Cornelius Cole, and points with pride to his record, not only as an outstanding statesman in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States during an epochal period of our national existence but as a citizen of that great State where silver strands meet shining western sea, where towering mountains frame fertile valleys, and where centenarians, like the distinguished gentleman presented here to-day, round out their lives in physical and mental vigor in a land of wondrous beauty and plentitude—that Nirvana of happiness—where dreams come true. [Prolonged applause.]

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,229,461"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 89: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 89, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "for the procurement of gyro compass equipments for destroyers not already supplied; for the completion of armor, armament, ammunition, and torpedoes under manufacture on April 8, 1922; for the supply and complement of vessels which may be proceeded with as hereinbefore mentioned, including not to exceed 400 torpedoes of the destroyer type, and not more than $14,000,000 of the funds herein made available under 'Increase of the Navy' shall be applied to objects of expenditure heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Ordnance"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on Senate amendments numbered 3, 6, 13, 62, 64, 65, 86, 91, 92, and 93.

W. B. OLIVER.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I want to make just a short statement with reference to the report. The bill as it was reported to the House, in round numbers, carried $233,000,000. As passed by the House it carried $251,000,000. As passed by the Senate it carried $295,000,000; and if the recommendations made by the committee of conference are agreed to by the House it will carry when enacted into law $289,000,000. This is $124,000,000 less than the current year. The items which have been allowed by the conferees, subject to the approval of the House, are $5,682,500 for the so-called navy-yard items; $14,242,187 for increase in pay, almost entirely due to the pay bill recently passed by the House; $6,817,000, due to increase in aviation, which would have been included in the original House bill had the Committee on Appropriations authority to include appropriations for new aircraft; and $7,500,000 for the purpose of increasing the fund out of which ships are to be constructed under the terms of the treaty—that is, ships that are to be permitted to be finished.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, would it embarrass the gentleman if I asked him a question at this point?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are any increases carried, agreed to by the conferees, that have been occasioned by the default of the nations who were parties to the limitation of armaments conference in not approving those treaties?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read in a newspaper that there had been some additional amounts provided in the bill to carry on construction work on some of the battleships.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought, perhaps, that was due to a default of the other nations in failing to ratify the treaty.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; the $7,500,000 carried for increasing the construction fund is made necessary very largely because of the conversion of two battle cruisers into airplane carriers. In looking into that situation, as to the material on these ships, it was discovered that the contractors had such quantities of material on hand that it would consume a large proportion of the $44,000,000 allowed in the House bill. The amount required to pay for the material was so great a proportion of the whole that there was not a sufficient amount left to pay for the labor incident to carrying on the work. Therefore, it made it necessary to increase the amount by $7,500,000. It is, however, on the continuing program, and what is paid this year will not have to be paid next. The total amount added to the bill is $38,000,000, made up largely, as I say, of the items that I have enumerated.

The Secretary of the Navy recommended a larger amount for the navy-yard items than the Senate allowed or than is provided in this report.

The Secretary asked an additional $18,000,000 above the amounts carried in the House bill after the personnel was increased to 86,000; but after some 500 pages of hearings conducted by the other body, it was determined that the amounts allowed by the House bill were within five or six million dollars, even in their judgment, of being entirely sufficient.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I noticed in a brief statement from a Senator that no other nation that was represented at this conference here had as yet ratified these treaties. Is that true?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think that is true. The various nations of the world are taking the matter up at this time. The treaties have been acted upon by the House of Commons in Great Britain and are being considered by the House of Lords. The new premier of Japan, fortunately, is one of the conferees who attended the Washington conference, and the treaties are being considered in the Japanese Parliament. I am advised that within a reasonable time all of the nations that agreed to the treaties will ratify them.

Mr. FESS. There has been no adverse vote anywhere on these treaties?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What is the status of the scrapping bill that passed the House a few weeks ago?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is in the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is there any assurance that that will be taken up soon and passed?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That I do not know.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is not this bill made up on the supposition that that bill will become a law?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If that bill becomes a law, will we need all of the money provided for in this bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; and more.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is, we will need more money if the scrapping bill is passed?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. When the scrapping bill becomes a law, that means that contracts which have been canceled for the construction of all these ships will have to be adjusted.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And that will mean money.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That will require a large sum of money; just how much, of course, is problematical, but it has been estimated as high as $75,000,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the scrapping bill becomes a law, it will not reduce any appropriation in this bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I see now what the gentleman means. This bill was drawn with the idea, of course, that the treaty provisions would all be carried out.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And the passage of the scrapping bill will not make less expenditures than are provided for now?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. That was all anticipated in drafting this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to make an inquiry. I have observed recently newspaper accounts of scrapping that has already been done of big naval guns that have been destroyed by having their muzzles perforated so that they are useless, and where scrapping is being done on certain ships. Now, does the gentleman know whether that is going on now? The thought in my mind is whether it is not a pretty good plan not to do any of this scrapping until we know whether the naval treaty is going to be ratified or not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The scrapping the gentleman speaks of would likely be of guns upon obsolete ships which would be scrapped in any event.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think one was the Iowa.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is one of the very oldest of our ships, and would not be useful much longer in any event.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Thirteen-inch guns shown with holes burned through them, I suppose, to destroy them. I do not think personally that we ought to do any of this scrapping until we get to the place where we know the treaty is ratified by the nations interested.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think the gentleman will find ships like the Iowa and Massachusetts are considered worthless by the Navy Department anyhow.

Mr. OLIVER. Feeling was expressed in the House and also in the Senate as to the retention of civilian instructors at the academy next year, and the House appropriation was retained and a provision inserted which would insure the retention of the civilian instructors, except for sufficient cause being shown for their dismissal.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama, has stated the case perfectly; and I think in that respect your conferees have carried out the wishes of the House almost completely. In other words, as to the civilian professors at the acadamy, we have provided that none shall be discharged except in compliance with the terms of their contract where they have contracts, and those who have no contracts will be dismissed only by giving them six months' notice, unless the dismissal is due to cause. That fixes it so that the civilian professors will not be discharged arbitrarily, but must be given six months' notice, so they will have plenty of time to procure employment elsewhere. School-teachers are, of course, in a little different category from anybody else in reference to securing employment. They can find employment only at certain seasons of the year, and so we thought it proper that they should have reasonable notice if their services are to be discontinued.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Just for a question. Reverting back to the point raised by my friend from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], and in order to enlarge the scope of his thought, does not the gentleman think that there should be no scrapping done without due authority from Congress in any case?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There will not be. The House has passed a bill authorizing it——

Mr. LAYTON. But the Senate has not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The Senate has not passed it, but there will be no scrapping of these vessels provided for under the treaty undoubtedly until the authority is given. The Navy Department has large numbers of old ships which, under existing law, they have authority to break up and dispose of. These, I am sure, are the vessels referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If I am not mistaken I saw in the press the other day that 31 civilian instructors had been dropped.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am inclined to think there must be some mistake about that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It was in the press and there was a great controversy over it by the press of the Nation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am quite sure Admiral Wilson will carry out the wishes of the Congress just as soon as he finds out just what it is.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will permit, Admiral Wilson advised the Navy Department, and the Navy Department advised me that there was absolutely no truth in the statement that they had dismissed 31 civilians.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How late?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Four days ago.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. A good deal was said about the teaching situation at the academy and of course the civilian instructors were naturally more or less anxious about their positions, and I imagine they were somewhat suspicious that they might be dropped, but from what I have been able to learn I am satisfied Admiral Wilson will handle the situation justly and carry out the provisions of law in the spirit in which it is passed by Congress. These various reports we have heard about his discharging teachers, I think, have not been well founded. Admiral Wilson, I will say, has, to a very great degree, and possibly to a greater degree than any other officer in the Navy, tried to cooperate with Congress in its desire to effect economies.

I consider him an extraordinary man and one of the very best officers that we have in any service of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand there are two airplane carriers to be constructed?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There will be as soon as the bill goes through authorizing it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They will be completed for $7,500,000.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Not completed, but they will have all the money that can be reasonably expended on them during the coming year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How long will it take to complete them?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The two that are to be finished are battle cruisers that are pretty well along, and I am inclined to think that in perhaps two years they will be finished as airplane carriers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any estimate as to the additional pay that was required in the appropriations occasioned by the passage since this bill went through the House of the so-called officers' pay bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The whole amount was about $13,000,000. That was not over the present pay, but over the pay which they received prior to the 1920 act, which gave them a temporary increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any figures stating the amount over the pay they received last year under the temporary pay bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. My impression is it would not be any higher. Perhaps almost in the same notch.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is some additional pay occasioned to the enlisted personnel by reason of the increase of their base pay from $18 to $21. Has the gentleman any estimate as to the amount of increase in that particular?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The present base pay was $31. Perhaps I am not quite accurate in saying the present base pay, but the pay of the lowest rank in the Navy under the old law would be $31, and under the new pay bill the lowest pay will be about $21.

Mr. McARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. McARTHUR. The appropriation for pay carried in this conference report in the bill as it now stands is upon the basis of the pay bill recently passed and signed by the President?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is right.

Now, if there are no other items in the bill which the House would like to have me discuss, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to express appreciation of what the conferees on the part of the House have done in adjusting this question of the civilian professors at the Naval Academy. I hope it may turn out that the estimate of the gentleman from Michigan as to Admiral Wilson and his attitude toward the civilian teachers may prove to be correct. To be accurate, the superintendent gave notice of dismissal to 5 civilian professors and 6 instructors—11 altogether—as soon as this provision was inserted in the bill by the Senate committee. It is my understanding that some of those notices were recalled when doubt arose as to what the Congress would finally do. I am hoping that the superintendent will recall all of them and not dismiss any of the civilian professors contrary to the provisions of their contracts.

First, let me say that the superintendent recommended the dismissal of 78 of these civilian professors. Of course the House repudiated that recommendation and put a provision in the bill that no naval officer could be substituted for a civilian professor who was teaching there on the 1st of January last, and increased the appropriation back to the amount appropriated for the current year so as to retain the entire corps of civilian professors. The Senate reduced that amount about $100,000, and the conferees have restored the amount which the House allowed, making the appropriation now $421,500; this is a sufficient amount to retain all the present civilian personnel of the faculty. Now, I am assuming that in view of the fact that the conferees after careful deliberation have restored the amount which the House originally appropriated for the employment of civilian professors, and in view of the fact that they have inserted this provision in the bill providing that in reducing the number of civilian professors, no existing contract shall be violated, and have provided further that no civilian professor, associate, or assistant professor, or instructor shall be dismissed, except for sufficient cause, without six months' notice to him that his services will be longer needed—I say in view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the conferees have put all those provisions in the bill, I draw the conclusion that it was the intention of the conferees that there should be no wholesale dismissal of civilian professors; that there should be no substitution of naval officers for civilian teachers, and that there be no civilian professors dismissed except for sufficient cause.

Now, if my conclusion is not right I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me say that the committee deliberately changed the Senate provision that read that professors should not be dismissed, excepting on six months' notice, so as to include assistant and associate professors and instructors as well. I think the gentleman ought to bear that in mind in connection with the question. Also, we have restored the House provision touching the appropriation, making it $421,500 instead of $321,500, as provided by the Senate. In other words, the conference committee endeavored to make this provision in such shape that the administration of the Naval Academy would interpret the meaning of the Congress to be that it did not propose to interfere by strong-arm methods with the employment of professors, associate or assistant professors, or instructors, leaving to the naval administration the power of dismissal only wherever there was sufficient cause. I think the gentleman will find that the provisions that the conference committee has recommended will meet that situation.

Mr. DENISON. I assume that by "sufficient cause" that would mean the fact that he is not needed or the fact that he is morally unfit or is incapable of properly teaching. It would not be "sufficient cause," within the meaning of that language as used in the bill, when the superintendent might simply wish to substitute a naval officer for a civilian professor.

Mr. FRENCH. I do not believe the members of the conference committee thought that such a cause would be a sufficient one. I had no such idea.

Mr. DENISON. I am very glad to have that statement.

Mr. FRENCH. It must be a cause that turns upon the worth of the faculty member, in my opinion.

Mr. DENISON. I am very glad to have that assurance.

Mr. MUDD. If a professor was dismissed for cause, do you think the admiral should replace that professor by putting somebody else there, another professor, or another civilian, in his place?

Mr. DENISON. I should think if the admiral should dismiss a civilian professor, under the provisions of this report, it would be his duty to replace him by another civilian professor, if there was need for another civilian professor. At any rate, he would not be justified in displacing him with a naval officer.

Mr. MUDD. I think the intention was very strong and clear to have the admiral reduce the civilian professors at the academy.

Mr. DENISON. If he wanted to reduce them and put naval officers in their place, he would not be permitted to do that under this report.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How many of these notices of dismissal were issued?

Mr. DENISON. As I stated a moment ago, my information is that he gave 11 notices, and they were received by the professors. But as soon as it was ascertained that the provision inserted by the Senate committee was not going to be retained, my information is that since then some of these notices have been recalled.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Have not those notices been issued since this bill passed the Senate?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. They were issued as soon as the bill was reported to the Senate by the Senate committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Pending the action of the Senate?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; pending the action of the Senate, and as soon as that provision was put in by the Senate committee; but as I understand, since that time—I will say in the interest of accuracy that those notices have been recalled.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reading the language agreed to by the conferees, it seems that a professor, after six months' notice, can be removed for cause or without cause.

Mr. DENISON. I will yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], one of the conferees, to answer that.

Mr. FRENCH. It seems to me that that provision must be read in connection with the other—that no contract shall be violated.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But outside of the contract he can be dismissed in six months' time, with or without cause; and if the superintendent wishes, he can rid the academy of civilian professors; he can do so if he chooses.

Mr. DENISON. I know it is not the intention of Congress that that should be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. What right had you to give them the right to dismiss on six months' notice when there are more than 80 civilian instructors employed?

Mr. DENISON. The superintendent could have done that heretofore under the contract.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The purpose of this provision that we wrote in was to make the contract hold just the same as with any private employer. We wanted to be assured that the professors there had the same notice of the recall of the contract or reasonable notice where there was no contract so that there would be perfect equity. I think we have accomplished it.

Mr. DENISON. I think so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Under the existing law is the superintendent of the academy obliged to hire only civilian help?

Mr. DENISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What does the law say as to the number he is obliged to employ?

Mr. DENISON. I do not think the law specifies the number that he must employ. But the Boards of Visitors have been making a study of the subject in recent years, and they recommended that a certain number be retained there while the present number of midshipmen continues, and that has been approved by the former Secretary of the Navy.
